Mr. Chairman, a merchant marine is of no value to this country unless it is manned by American seamen. American subsidized ships with alien seamen or with underpaid American seamen does not inspire the high degree of patriotism demanded in case of war if our merchant marine is intended to serve as a naval auxiliary. One of the fundamental purposes of any merchant marine bill should be to give a fair wage and reasonable hours to the seamen of this country. They number about 165,000, I am informed, and while I do not like a good many features of the bill, I think the committee should be commended. I am heartily in favor of the concessions which it has made to the International Seamen's Union. I am very much in favor of the better hours and the holidays and Sundays that have been granted the seamen, as well as the improved service-book feature. I also want to commend the amendment offered by my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], in establishing the prevailing wage in the shipbuilding industry. I think this bill will give us some material gain, consequently I am going to give it my support. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 8 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. May I ask the distinguished Chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee a question in reference to the service-book matter which Mr. Furuseth was worried about being used as a blacklist? Is there anything that has been done in this bill to prevent the blacklisting of men who indulge in union activities, to stop the operators from driving them off the sea?

Mr. BLAND. I may say to the gentleman, in view of the question yesterday, I compared this amendment with the amendment that was offered by Mr. O'BRIEN.

I thought we had it practically in the exact language. The only changes are that we call it a service book, while he calls it a continuous discharge book, and in line 15, at the beginning of the line, where the bill says "service book which shall contain the signature", he uses the language, "be retained by him and which shall contain." If I had noticed this difference, I would have been pleased to have put the language in the bill. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CONNERY. Would the gentleman offer that as an amendment?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, page 48, line 15, insert before the word "contain" the words "be retained by him and which shall."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: On page 48, line 15, before the word "contain", insert "be retained by him and which shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman want to change the word "service" to "continuous discharge"?

Mr. CONNERY. Is that what he wanted?

Mr. BLAND. That is what he wanted, and I do not know that there is any particular objection to it.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I should like to ask how many propositions of the International Seamen's Union were accepted and what parts were rejected in the program they offered the Committee on the Merchant Marine?

Mr. BLAND. I could not answer that question. They have a number of suggestions that are to be made the subject of future study which we did not think should be contained in the pending bill.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. By discharge, do they mean that when a man is fired for cause they put the reason for the discharge in the book?

Mr. BLAND. No; and the only things that are required under this section as we are perfecting it now are the things that Mr. O'Brien, of the International Seamen's Union, was willing to accept.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the chairman offer that amendment?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Page 48, line 14, strike out the word "service" and insert the words "continuous discharge."

Page 49, line 7, strike out the word "service" and insert the words "continuous discharge."

Page 49, line 15, strike out the word "service" and insert "continuous discharge."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we inserted the word "photograph" on page 48, line 17. The seamen objected to the word "thumbprint", and that was not put in. When Mr. O'Brien was testifying he stated they had no objection to the photograph, and, in fact, felt that the photograph is a protection, because there have been so many fraudulent transfers of these discharge certificates.

Mr. CONNERY. There is just one more question I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to the Morro Castle disaster. Is there any provision in the bill or would there be any objection to forcing all of these ships to have sprinkler systems on them?

Mr. BLAND. I think the provision is that they shall be as fireproof as practicable, and I may say to the gentleman that I would rather not have that in the bill now. We do not know how far that might go. I have a bill pending that I expect to pass under suspension of the rules or under a rule providing for a reorganization of the inspection service and providing for a technical staff that will consider various plans, and the bill also provides for a study with respect to the practicability of the sprinkler system.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the chairman please explain the meaning of the word "rating"?

Mr. BLAND. That is in Mr. O'Brien's bill, and a question arose as to photographs in the consideration of the bill by the committee. We called up the Commissioner of Navigation, and he advised us that "rating" meant whether a man was an able seaman or ordinary seaman, or the capacity in which he served, and did not deal with his manner of service.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. MORAN: On page 49, after line 17, insert a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 804. The Commission is authorized and directed to investigate the employment and wage conditions in ocean-going shipping, and after making such investigation to prescribe and enforce minimum manning scales and minimum wage scales for all officers and crews employed on all types of vessels operated by citizens of the United States, and including vessels operated by the United States Merchant Marine Corporation in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States. After such minimum manning and wage scales shall have been prescribed by the Commission, no change shall be made by the Commission in such scales except upon formal complaint, public notice of the hearing to be had on such complaint, and a hearing by the Commission of all parties under such rules as the Commission shall prescribe. Every citizen of the United States operating ocean-going shipping shall post and keep posted in a conspicuous place on each vessel operated by such citizen a printed copy of the minimum manning and wage scales prescribed by the Commission and applicable to such vessel. The provisions of this section shall be enforced in the same manner herein prescribed for the enforcement of the orders of the Commission."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IX—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 901. After any adjustment of any ocean-mail contract has been made or any financial aid or construction loan granted under the provisions of titles III, IV, V, or VI of this act, the authority in order to effect economies in personnel and administration may transmit all or such part of the papers relating thereto to the Secretary of Commerce for subsequent administration thereof for such time as the authority may see fit, in the same manner and through the same agencies as are now available to him in the administration of the powers and duties of the former United States Shipping Board.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, in reading the analysis of this bill in another body on yesterday—and I hope every Member of the House will read that analysis contained in today's RECORD—it is unquestionable that the bill now before us does not meet the requirements of the administration. It does not meet the objections of the President. It does not meet the requirements of the experience we have had in ship subsidies and the ocean mail subsidy that have created the scandals which have existed in relation to these subsidies.

It seems to me that in the consideration of this measure we ought to meet these objections, straighten them out, amend the bill, and stop, if we can, this criticism at least during this administration.

If we write this legislation, just as sure as we are here today, in my opinion, we are going to meet in future years one of the most notorious scandals we have ever known. Teapot Dome will not be compared with it. I do not see why the Membership cannot stay on the floor and hear the debate, rather than running in whenever called and voting blindly with the committee, why we cannot study the legislation and try to meet the suggestions outlined to us by the President and by the Senate investigating committee, and what we know to be the facts.

No doubt the committee has studied the legislation very carefully, but, as it has been pointed out heretofore, this bill does not meet those objections.

As has been pointed out, this bill does not meet the scandals that have occurred in relation to these ship and ocean mail subsidies. This bill makes no effort to correct the situation. There has been wide-open scandal connected with the ocean mail contracts as well as with the people building ships for the Government and then the Government giving them a mail contract that more than takes care of the overhead. In other words, they have their hands into the Treasury up to their shoulders. We sit supinely by and apparently are satisfied with it. I do not understand what is the trouble. Why is it we cannot stop this kind of legislation? Certainly the hundreds of millions of dollars they have carried off through past subsidies have gotten us nowhere, and this bill is worse than any of the prior bills—if that is possible. Our merchant marine immediately after the World War was in good shape, but those supposed to represent the Government have practically given these ships away.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Does not the gentleman think that the whole trouble is with the nonattendance of Members who ought to be here attending what is going on and hearing what is read, so that they can know what a rotten bill this is? [Laughter.]

Mr. McFARLANE. I intimated that in my opening remarks. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. If you will read the RECORD of what occurred yesterday in both branches of Congress, you will find a very clear presentation of this measure and very satisfactory reasons given why these bills should be defeated; you will also see the amendments offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN]. These gentlemen have shown by their presentation of their amendments that they have given a great deal of time and study to this measure, and it is unfortunate the Membership fails to stay on the floor to hear their able presentation of their reasons why this bill should be defeated.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. WEARIN: Eliminate section 901 of title IX by striking out the words beginning on line 19, page 49, and ending with line 4, on page 50.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, it is advisable for the proper administration of this subsidy bill that as many as possible of the functions involved in the administration of the same shall be placed in the hands of the group that is to administer the law. A division of it and the placing of a portion in the hands of one department and another portion in the hands of another only serves to confuse the situation, and to further defeat the proper administration and promotion of this proposed merchant-marine program. There is nothing in this amendment that would hinder the administration or the progress of the development of the merchant marine, but simply a consolidation of functions in the hands of the group that is supposed to administer the bill. We should endeavor to prevent a situation that will simply facilitate passing the buck from one bureau to another, occasion unnecessary delay, and afford cover to racketeers who will try to come in under the pending bill. We can do so by adopting my amendment.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, in view of the onerous duties of the authority, we believe it better to place this in the Secretary of Commerce for the time being.

I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WEARIN) there were—ayes 18, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-six Members present, a quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 904. All the power and authority over and in connection with the transportation by water of explosives and other dangerous articles vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission by the Transportation Explosives Act of March 4, 1921 (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 382 to 386, inclusive), are hereby transferred to and vested in the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEARIN: Eliminate section 904, title IX, beginning with line 19, on page 50, and ending with line 25, on the same page.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that is in conformity with the letter which came from the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. WEARIN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. So far as I am concerned, I think we may as well act on their suggestions. We accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 905. (a) All orders, rules, regulations, or other privileges made, issued, or granted in the exercise of or in respect of the powers and duties transferred under sections 304, 601, 701, and 904 of this act, and in effect at the time of the transfer, shall, insofar as not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, continue in effect to the same extent as if such transfer had not occurred, until modified, superseded, or repealed.

(b) All rights, interests, or remedies accruing or to accrue out of any provision of law or regulation relating to, or out of action taken in the exercise of, powers and duties so transferred under this act shall be valid in all respects and may be exercised and enforced.

(c) All provisions of law relating to the powers and duties so transferred under this act shall, insofar as such laws are not inapplicable, continue in full force and effect, and shall be administered by the respective agencies to which such powers and duties are transferred.

(d) No suit, action, or other proceeding commenced by or against the head of any agency in his official capacity in connection with powers and duties transferred under this act, or in relation to the exercise of any such powers and duties, shall abate by reason of any such transfer, but the court, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within 12 months after the date of enactment of this act, showing a necessity for a survival of such suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against the agency to which such powers and duties are so transferred.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a perfecting amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Page 51, line 1, strike out the figures "905" and insert "904", and on page 51, line 4, strike out the figures "904" and, before the figures "701", insert the word "and", and strike out the word "and" after the figures "701".

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE X—LIMITATION OF SHIPOWNER'S LIABILITY

SECTION 1001. Section 4283 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 183) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4283. (a) The liability of the owner of any vessel, for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction by any person, of any property, goods, or merchandise, shipped or put on board of such vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity, or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel, and her freight then pending: Provided, That the limitation of the liability of the owner of any sea-going vessel (other than a sea-going tug or barge) in respect of loss of life or bodily injury, as determined under this section, shall be not less than an amount equal to $60 for each ton of such vessel's tonnage.

"(b) For the purposes of this section and section 4283A the tonnage of such vessel shall be its gross tonnage after deducting therefrom all deductions (except the deduction for engine-room space) prescribed in section 4153, as amended (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 77), for computing the net or register tonnage of vessels built within the United States or owned by a citizen or citizens thereof.

"(c) The owner of any sea-going vessel (other than a sea-going tug or barge) shall be liable in respect of loss of life or bodily injury arising on distinct occasions to the same extent as if no other loss of life or bodily injury had arisen.

"(d) If there be more than one owner of a sea-going vessel (other than a sea-going tug or barge) the individual liability of any part-owner in respect of loss of life or bodily injury shall be limited, under the conditions provided in this section, as amended, to the proportion of the aggregate amount thereof for which all owners are liable that his individual share of the vessel bears to such aggregate amount; but this provision shall not prevent any claimant from joining all the owners in one action.

"(e) In respect of loss of life or bodily injury, the privity or knowledge of the master of a sea-going vessel (other than a sea-going tug or barge), or of the superintendent or managing agent of the owner thereof, at or prior to the commencement of each voyage, shall be deemed conclusively the privity or knowledge of the owner of such vessel."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: Page 53, commencing with the word "to" in line 17, strike out down to the semicolon in line 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to an amount which bears the same ratio to the total liability of the owners of such vessel in respect of loss of life or bodily injury as his individual share or the vessel bears to the whole."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KENNEY: Page 54, line 1, after the word "superintendent", insert "or person in the employ of the owner exercising superintendence."

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, this section, 1001 of title X of the bill, dealing with the limitation of shipowners' liability, has a subdivision (e) which provides that in respect to death or personal injury, the privity or knowledge of the master of a vessel, or of the superintendent or managing agent of the owner, at or before the beginning of each voyage, shall be deemed conclusively the privity or knowledge of the owner. A question arises as to the significance of the word "superintendent." That the owner may be charged with the knowledge of his employee who may be exercising superintendence although not bearing the title of superintendent my amendment has been offered. It has happened in the past that a person, not a superintendent, has been put in the place of the superintendent or has been assigned the duties of a superintendent. In case such a person in the employ of the owner in the exercise of superintendence has the knowledge contemplated by the act, that knowledge should be deemed to be the knowledge of the owner, otherwise a situation might exist where the superintendent would not have the knowledge, but a person exercising all the powers and duties of the superintendent might have the knowledge, and although the owner should be charged with the knowledge of such a person in his employ, under the language of this bill his knowledge would not be deemed to be the knowledge of the owner.

Mr. BLAND. If he is performing the duties, would he not be a superintendent under this language?

Mr. KENNEY. There seems to be a question about that. The courts have at times interpreted the word "superintendent." Very often they have held a superintendent to be a particular officer, a man who bears the title of superintendent, and in order to clarify this provision and make the owner responsible for the knowledge of any person who exercises superintendence, I believe this language ought to be inserted. Very often power is delegated to one who is beneath a superintendent, who is in actual charge, with the consent of the owner. Knowledge of such a man ought to be deemed to be knowledge of the owner of a ship.

I urge this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KENNEY) there were ayes 29 and noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 1101. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEARIN: Mr. WEARIN moves to amend section 1101 by adding, in line 11, the words and figures "not to exceed $1."

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this amendment for the purpose of discussing a provision with reference to subsidies that has not yet been mentioned to this House.

I call attention to the fact that under construction subsidies, authorized under the pending bill, we have no way of determining just how much those differentials between foreign costs and American costs may be from an accurate standpoint. One of the witnesses before our committee, Mr. Alfred H. Haag, of the Department of Commerce, who is a recognized authority in that field, made that admission before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries both, as I recollect it, with reference to operating subsidies and construction subsidies.

I would have you remember in connection with the same construction subsidies this fact: That under this bill we have no way of knowing how much the construction subsidy will be today as compared with tomorrow. For instance, let us presume that, figuring a construction subsidy of $1,000,000 ship at the present time, the authority determines, in its judgment—and that judgment can be no more than an approximation—a foreign differential of $400,000 today. Six months from now the authority, in considering that same question with reference to another million-dollar ship, may find that the foreign differential in the matter of construction may be $200,000. What will be the attitude of the American shipper, who, it is presumed, is going to cooperate in connection with the operation of this law to develop a merchant marine?

When the authority, by virtue of the circumstances and conditions of this act, is compelled to offer a variable construction subsidy representing the differential between foreign costs and American costs, there is nothing consistent or conducive to cooperation in the matter of construction subsidies from that standpoint. In fact, it may seriously retard the development of a merchant marine.

Mr. Chairman, to proceed further with the matter of subsidies, I again call attention to the fact that under this section operating subsidies, subsidies providing for construction differentials, and subsidies for trade penetration, have no limitation with reference to the amount that can be granted. I insist that there should have been added in this bill as per amendments I offered yesterday, a recapture clause that would have protected the public from having to pay excessive profits to either shipbuilders or ship operators. I believe, with all due regard to the members of the distinguished Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, there are many Members who voted against my amendment who believed as I did, and in whose conscience there existed the thought that the public should have been protected to that extent, but they did not agree with the exact phraseology of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN].

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1102. To aid in carrying out the policy and primary purpose of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time for expenditure by or with the approval of the authority, such sums as may be necessary, for the operation by citizens of the United States, of ships or line of ships which have been or may be taken over by the United States, and when not inconsistent with the public interest, to insure a fair rate to shippers of American goods, to enable American ship operators to carry an equitable share of our foreign commerce, or to insure vessels of American registry equitable consideration in conference agreements.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In this section and in the previous section it is evident that no one has any idea how much this measure is going to cost the United States Government if it is enacted into law. I doubt if anyone knows how much the Shipping Board cost the United States or how much the act of 1928 cost the United States.

In the colloquy yesterday the distinguished chairman of this committee stated that in round numbers, if the contracts are carried out under the act of 1928, we shall have spent $308,000,000 out of the Treasury under that act, and that the Post Office Department has paid $119,000,000 in mail subsidies in the same time. We still have great sums coming to the Government on loans by the Shipping Board under the act of 1928.

It has been evident during this debate that no one contends that either the the Shipping Board or the measures taken under the Act of 1928, have been effective in giving us a merchant marine. They failed to give us a merchant marine. No ship subsidy has ever given the United States a merchant marine. This bill, as shown in the minority report, does not conform in two important particulars, at least, with the recommendations of the President of the United States. I want to say to the Members on the Democratic side that they should not vote for this bill under the mistaken idea that this is an administration measure or that it is something sponsored by the President of the United States. Yesterday the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN] stated at least on two occasions, and it was never contradicted, that under this act a vessel costing $1,000,000 could draw down a donation of $400,000 and a loan of $450,000.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. And there is not any way in the world that we can get any yardstick to compare what it will cost us to build ships as compared with foreign countries? So anything we pay them is a guess?

Mr. BIERMANN. I agree with the gentleman. The remaining $150,000 could be made up at least in part by trading in obsolete ships to be junked.

The Democratic Party historically has been the friend of the merchant marine of our country. The founder of the Democratic Party proposed that the American people should be an agricultural people and a seagoing people. In the 60 years in which the Democratic Party ruled this country almost uninterruptedly we acquired one of the largest merchant marines afloat. The Democratic Party in that time paid no subsidies to our vast merchant marine. The Republican Party destroyed our merchant marine not by failing to vote ship subsidies, but through their vicious tariff laws.

The Democratic Party historically has been against ship subsidies. No one knows what this act is going to cost. No one knows what this act is going to accomplish. The sponsors of the Shipping Board legislation painted the most rosy picture of a merchant marine that could be imagined. The sponsors of the Jones-White Act of 1928 painted the most rosy picture of what would be accomplished for the merchant marine by that act; and now we have a third picture—just as rosy, but no one can say that this third picture is any more likely to eventuate than either of the other two.

No one predicted when the Shipping Board was given the vast authority it exercised, or when the Jones-White Act was passed, that we would have the scandals that occurred; and no one, not even the chairman of this committee, can tell you that this act is proof against the kind of scandals that have disgraced this country the last 12 or 13 years.

Mr. BLAND. I think it is, if the gentleman is calling on the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BIERMANN. The chairman says it is proof against scandal.

Mr. Chairman, this bill should be defeated in its entirety.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEARIN: Page 62, strike out section 1102 beginning at line 12 and ending in line 23.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARTER). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1103. (a) All appropriations and unexpended balances of appropriations available for expenditure by the United States Shipping Board Bureau, which would otherwise be applicable to functions transferred to the Authority by this act, including the fund appropriated to enable the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation to operate ships or lines of ships which have been or may be taken back from purchasers by reason of competition or other methods employed by foreign shipowners or operators as appropriated by the Independent Offices Act, 1928, approved February 11, 1927 (44 Stat. 1082), and reappropriated by the Department of Commerce Appropriation Act, 1936, approved March 22, 1935, shall be available for expenditure by or at the direction of the Authority for any and all objects of expenditure authorized by this act in the discretion of the Authority, without regard to the requirement of apportionment under the Antideficiency Act of February 27, 1906 (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 665).

(b) After the transfer, under section 304 of this act, to the Authority of the powers and duties of the Postmaster General with respect to existing ocean mail contracts entered into pursuant to title IV, Merchant Marine Act, 1928 (U. S. C., supp. VII, title 46, secs. 891e to 891r, inclusive), all appropriations and unexpended balances of appropriations available for expenditure by the Post Office Department for "Foreign Mail Service, Merchant Marine Act" under the Merchant Marine Act, 1928, shall be available for any and all objects of expenditure authorized by this act, by or at the direction of the Authority, without regard to the requirement of apportionment under the Antideficiency Act of February 27, 1906.

(c) Appropriations available under this section may be expended for all necessary expenses in administering the functions, powers, and duties of the Authority, including the same purposes and within the same limitations as now authorized by law for expenditure by the Post Office Department, Department of Commerce, and Merchant Fleet Corporation.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the amendment offered to section 1102 was not adopted by this House. This bill should be defeated for section 1102 alone if for nothing else. It is the one section of the bill that will make it possible for the Treasury of the United States to be opened wide to anyone who desires his losses to be underwritten or to establish new trade routes in competition with existing services thereby conducting a rate war at the expense of the American taxpayers. That was formerly incorporated in another provision of the bill. By all means we should guarantee to the public protection against a Treasury raid of this particular type.

In my opinion this section of the bill constitutes a sufficiently dangerous feature to warrant the measure being defeated in this body, and I trust anyone who votes for the bill will keep in mind the fact that under section 1102 operators of steamship companies can collect untold subsidies upon the basis of the most remote claims imaginable. No one knows or dares to estimate how much this joker in the bill is going to cost the public.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEARIN. I yield.

Mr. MORAN. This bill has for its purpose the providing of a subsidy to enable American ship operators to carry an equitable part of our foreign commerce. This is a thing we have not been able to do under the provisions of the act of 1928. What are the actual figures of the amount of commerce we have carried? In 1923 it was 45 percent; in 1924 it was 43 percent; in 1925 it was 41 percent; in 1926 it was 38 percent; in 1927 it was 35 percent; and so on down to 33 percent.

If we have had to pay what we were required to pay in order to carry 31 percent of our commerce what shall we be required to pay under section 1102 of the pending bill to carry 50 percent of the commerce of the country?

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman's observations are proper and I would say to him, as I have said before, that the sky is the limit.

Concluding my statement in reference to section 1102, I call attention to the fact that it provides authorization for the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary. Can any Member of Congress visualize a more brazen raid upon the public purse?

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEARIN. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Under the act of 1928, or the Shipping Board Act, no differentials in operating expenses were provided for except as they might be taken care of through ocean mail contracts. Of course the reason both those acts failed to accomplish the purpose hoped of them, was inability to compete with cheap foreign ships.

Mr. WEARIN. I would say in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts that without question, as demonstrated by the excessive profits of those companies, the subsidies paid under the 1928 act were adequate to develop the American merchant marine, but its failure to do so was because of the failure of the companies to cooperate with the letter and the spirit of the law plus their greedy desire for excessive salaries and profits portrayed so vividly in part I of Postmaster General Farley's reports to President Roosevelt upon the individual lines participating in the graft. Furthermore, as far as cheap foreign ships are concerned, the gentleman certainly could not ask for any cheaper ships than those sold to the operators by the United States Government at a fraction of their cost and of their value. The gentleman has evidently forgotten that 220 ships were sold to the operators by the Shipping Board that have been generally used in mail-contract service. They cost $516,174,249.48. They were sold to the private operators on long and liberal terms for $41,411,665.10. This is $23,561,229.90 less than the value of the vessels after they had written down almost 90 percent of their original cost within a period of a very few years following their construction during which they were kept in excellent repair by the Shipping Board at the expense of the Government. It is evident the gentleman is all wrong when he infers that our lack of a merchant marine today is due to an unfair advantage occasioned by cheap foreign ships. Quite the contrary is true. American operators have been given every advantage under the 1928 act and have failed miserably to deliver the goods.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we are now approaching a vote on the ship subsidy bill, and I would suggest that in considering the vote the Democrats in particular pay attention to expressions in their party platform. In my extension of remarks on yesterday I included excerpts from various Democratic platforms on the question of raids on the Treasury by shipowners and the Shipping Trust with the sanction of the Republican Party. Are we going to let them do it now with the sanction of the Democratic Party? Listen to what the Democratic Party platform states about this sort of Treasury raids:

We oppose as illogical and unsound any efforts to overcome by subsidy the handicaps to American shipping and commerce imposed by Republican policies.

It would not be surprising for a Member on the other side of the aisle to vote for such a bill as this.

The country would not be surprised at the Republican Party voting for a bill like this and bringing it out under their administration, but they certainly would be surprised at the Democratic Party repeating the mistake and letting the door open to the scandals that we had under the ship-subsidy bills passed by the Republican administration. I dare say there is not a Democratic candidate or a man who came here as a Democratic candidate that sometime in his own campaign has not condemned this nefarious raid on the Treasury by the shipping interests of the country.

I think we should not only live up to our platform, but we ought to heed the President's request when he states in his own message to the Congress, "I propose that we end this subterfuge." He meant he proposed the end of this system of subsidies to one very little group in this country.

Mr. Chairman, we are about to vote on this bill. I hope we will have a roll call so that the Democratic Party may go on record as to whether or not they believe in the things set forth in their platform and as to whether or not they are going to follow the recommendation of their President. This bill should be defeated for the sake of standing behind our own platform and for the sake of doing what the President asks us to do in the interest of the country at large. I hope the chairman of the committee will ask for a roll-call vote on this bill, so the people back home will know who their Representatives are who consent to the continuation of the scandalous Treasury raids that the Republican Party originated for the benefit of a few wealthy shipbuilders.

The Clerk read as follows:

REQUISITION OF VESSELS

SEC. 1104. Section 702 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 46, sec. 891t), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"REQUISITION OF VESSELS

"SEC. 702. (a) The following vessels may be taken over and purchased or used by the United States for national defense in time of war or when war is imminent:

"(1) Any vessel in respect of which, under a contract heretofore or hereafter entered into, a loan is made from the construction loan fund created by section 11 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 46, sec. 870)—at any time until the principal and interest of the loan have been paid;

"(2) Any vessel in respect of which an ocean mail contract has been heretofore entered into—at any time during the period for which the contract is in effect; and

"(3) Any vessel in respect of which a construction or operating subsidy is granted pursuant to the Merchant Marine Act, 1935.

"(b) In such event the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of taking, or paid the fair compensation for its use based upon such fair actual value, but in neither case shall such fair actual value be enhanced by the causes necessitating the taking. In the case of a vessel taken over and used, but not purchased, the vessel shall be restored to the owner in a condition at least as good as when taken, less reasonable wear and tear, or the owner shall be paid an amount for reconditioning sufficient to place the vessel in such condition. The owner shall not be paid for any consequential damages arising from such taking over and purchase or use. In the case of a vessel which has received a construction subsidy as provided in part I, title V, of the Merchant Marine Act, 1935, in determining fair actual value under this paragraph consideration shall be given to the fact that such construction subsidy was paid by the Government; and in the case of a vessel which was purchased from the Government, the purchase price and attendant circumstances shall be considered in determining such fair actual value.

"(c) The President shall ascertain the fair compensation for such taking over and purchase or use and shall certify to Congress the amount so found by him to be due, for appropriation and payment to the person entitled thereto. If the amount so fixed by the President is unsatisfactory to the person entitled thereto, such person shall be entitled to sue the United States for the amount of such fair compensation, and such suit shall be brought in the manner provided by paragraph 20 of section 24 or by section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended [U. S. C., title 28, secs. 41, 250]."

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORAN: On page 65, line 8, after the word "talking", insert "not, however, to exceed the cost of such vessels to the owner less depreciation based on a 20-year life of the vessel."

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, this section deals with taking over ships in the event of war, and therefore it is most important for our consideration. We have managed by legislation since the war to do some things that have obviated the condition that existed during the World War, when we had such things as consequential damage to pay for. We have made an improvement in this respect.

However, in this case we find two instances in this particular section to which we should give consideration. One is that the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel. The determination of that is a difficult thing at best. It seems to me in the event of an emergency, where the cost of taking over the ship is enhanced sometimes, as we found in the World War, that a different rule should apply. We did not get into the World War until 1917, but the World War began in 1914. The price of the vessels had enhanced from 1914 to 1917. We needed them, but that was not the cause of the enhancement; nevertheless, we had to pay a higher price on that account. This particular amendment states the limit that we shall pay, and that is the actual cost of the vessel to the owner less depreciation, based on a reasonable 20-year life.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1106. The Authority shall have the power to permit members of conferences to agree in writing with shippers or receivers of freight in foreign trade to return a stipulated part of freight moneys to the shipper or receiver of freight in consideration of the shipper or receiver of freight confining his shipments to lines and vessels which are members of the conference.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MORAN: On page 67, line 3, strike out section 1106, beginning with line 3 and ending with line 9.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a one-sentence section, so please bear with me in order that I may read the one sentence and see what is permitted in the bill. Here is the sentence:

The Authority shall have the power to permit members of conferences to agree in writing with shippers or receivers of freight in foreign trade to return a stipulated part of freight moneys to the shipper or receiver of freight in consideration of the shipper or receiver of freight confining his shipments to lines and vessels which are members of the conference.

What does that mean? That is legalizing deferred rebates. It is a distinct detriment to and a discrimination against the small shipper. Only the big fellows in this country are going to get the rebate. Only the big fellow is going to have the agreement made with him that part of this money is going to be handed back to him if he makes an arrangement to send his goods on that particular route. The little fellow is never going to hear anything about it. He is simply going to be at a disadvantage and wonder why it is that somewhere along the line his delivery price is more than his competitor's.

Mr. Chairman, even the present legislation does not legalize deferred rebates. This bill does. If you want to legalize deferred rebates for the big shippers of this country, here is the chance to do it right here by voting against this particular amendment.

Mr. SIROVICH. I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, it was my fight in the Merchant Marine Committee that put this section into the bill. In order that the Members of Congress may know the fundamental characteristics behind this section, permit me to call your attention to the following facts. From Norway, Sweden, and Denmark there come into the harbors of New York and Atlantic seacoast, between 2,000 and 2,500 tramp steamers. These tramp steamers are the parasites of the ocean. They have been chiefly responsible for the destruction of the American merchant marine—the little that is left of it. Mr. Chairman, every year conferences are held between the various nationals of European countries that operate merchant-marine ships, with the nationals of our Republic, who operate ocean-going ships. The purposes of these conferences are to present a formula which will eliminate cutthroat competition and make it possible for all the nations to meet upon a common ground. Every country has subscribed to this principle with the exception of the operators of the tramp ships from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. These companies have refused to enter the conference. The reason for their conduct is that as soon as they find out the minimum cost of transportation of the conference agreements, they circularize the various commercial, industrial, and agricultural industries of our country and inform them they will carry their transportation 10 to 20 percent cheaper than our own American merchant marine will. These Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish tramp steamship owners exploit labor. Their ships are perfected with nonunion labor. Their cost of production is cheap. Their cost of maintenance is contingent upon the lowest formula that seamen can live upon. They are therefore enabled to undersell any merchant-marine organization that is trying to live in conformity with American standards. These tramp steamships should be driven from the ocean. They are a menace to the merchant marine of our country.

The purpose of this provision that would give a deferred rebate is to enable our American merchant marine when they sail to foreign countries, particularly South America, Africa, and Asia, to be in a position to have a weapon to compete against these miserable tramp steamers that have undermined the possibilities of earning a livelihood for our merchant marine. This deferred dividend enables our owners of ocean-going steamships to enter into a contract with foreign nationals that if they will give their business to our American merchant marine for 1 year and extend it for another year we will give the back 10-percent rebate, which puts our American ships upon a parity with the tramp steamers that take away the business of our own companies.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The agreements in conference are exactly comparable to codes in industry?

Mr. SIROVICH. Exactly. It prevents the tramp steamers from chiseling against our merchant marine. By putting foreign tramp steamers out of business we will have to give less of an operating subsidy to our American shipowners. These tramp steamers have not only ruined our merchant marine but have ruined the merchant marine of some of the greatest countries of Europe.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. LUCKEY. I know the gentleman has studied this problem very carefully and is informed upon it. Under this bill, if it becomes a law, how much will be the annual cost to the United States in meeting the obligations under the bill?

Mr. SIROVICH. England today has 23,000,000 tons in shipping. The United States has 13,000,000 tons. If we eliminate the lake carriers and tankers from consideration, we have left 5,100,000 tons of shipping. Of this sum 4,800,000 tons will be ships that are between 10 to 20 years old. They are already obsolescent. The only amount of tonnage that we have left of the ones that are under 10 years old is 300,000 tons, which is the lowest modern construction of any civilized nation in the world.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes to answer the questions of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCKEY. What is the total cost to which we would be subjected by way of subsidies and other things?

Mr. SIROVICH. In 7 years' time, Mr. Chairman, if the provisions of this bill are enacted into law, our American merchant marine would be enabled to carry 51 percent of the exportable products of our country to the world markets. We have today a revolving fund of $250,000,000 which is found in the Shipping Board construction fund, as well as moneys that have been received by the Emergency Fleet Corporation for the disposition of our ships and for moneys due from the various 35 different lines operating trade routes throughout the world. This money, in my humble opinion, would be sufficient to give us a start to begin to reconstruct our old obsolete ships and make it possible for America to produce in its various shipyards modern, up-to-date passenger and cargo ships that would carry the merchandise and industrial and agricultural products of our Nation, as well as passengers, to all parts of the civilized world.

Mr. LUCKEY. The gentleman has not answered my question. The facts in the case are that under this bill we do not know what the amount will be that this Government will have to pay.

Mr. SIROVICH. At the end of the next 7 years 86 percent in principal and 77 percent in tonnage of the vessels now operating on ocean routes will have become 20 years old. If during the next 7 years we launch an average of 35 vessels a year, it will result in an investment of $35,000,000 a year. These $35,000,000 a year will give us, roughly, 35 vessels of cargo-line type, averaging about 14 knots, and at the end of 7 years, if the program of construction on that scale is maintained, we will have one of the most modern competitive merchant marines; not the largest but of a size to meet the present requirements for commerce and defense.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Then the gentleman would not have any objection to his committee asking for a roll call on this bill if it is such a good measure.

Mr. SIROVICH. Let me tell my distinguished friend from Wisconsin that I have never had any objection to standing up and being counted for any bill that has ever come before the House of Representatives. I have never voted for a serious gag rule in all the years I have been a Member of the House. To answer my friend as courageously as he knows I am capable of, let me tell him nothing will give me greater pleasure than to stand up and be counted as one who is in favor of the passage of this merchant-marine bill that will make our merchant marine one of the greatest and finest in all the world.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; I yield further.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman think this meets, in every respect, the desires of the President as expressed in his message?

Mr. SIROVICH. I have no right to speak for the President, but, knowing him as I do——

Mr. O'MALLEY. I have asked the gentleman a direct question—does he think this bill meets the desires of the President?

Mr. SIROVICH. I have no right to act as his spokesman, but I am convinced that, knowing him as I do and knowing his great interest in the merchant marine, if Congress passes this bill, he will sign the measure. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORAN) there were 37 ayes and 80 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1107. Contract carriers by water engaged in the interstate or foreign commerce of the United States may under the same terms and conditions applicable to common carriers enter into conference agreements subject to the provisions of section 15 of the Shipping Act, 1916 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 814), as amended by this act.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from New York said that there was a revolving fund of $250,000,000. I would like to ask him how it can be utilized.

Mr. SIROVICH. Out of the construction fund.

Mr. BLAND. That is provided for in another act, and a subsequent limitation by an appropriation bill permitting only $150,000,000.

Mr. BIERMANN. Section 1101 provides "There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act." I venture to say that there is not a gentleman on the committee that can say how much that will be. The gentleman from New York said that this bill would save the farmers and the industrial group $500,000,000 a year.

Mr. SIROVICH. I will show the gentleman that the saving to the farmers and the industrialists will be at least $500,000,000. From 1914 to 1917, when the World War broke out, we only had 8 percent of the ships carrying exportable merchandise. The rest was carried by England, France, Germany, and Italy. When the war broke out they withdrew their ships, and our industrial products could not be transported. We therefore overpaid the foreign-owned shipping companies to the extent of $500,000,000 to carry our exportable products in their bottoms which should have been carried in our own.

Mr. BIERMANN. But from 1914 to 1917 our farmers were much better off than they were under the Shipping Board Act.

Mr. SIROVICH. But they lost millions of dollars in money they had to pay out for transportation of their goods that otherwise would have been left in their own pockets.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. I do not think all the time will be used, but there are some amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

On page 67, line 15, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following language:

"Provided, That no such contract carrier shall enter into any conference agreement, belong to or become a part of any conference or association relieved of the antitrust acts which either through official acts or policies prevents or attempts to prevent, either directly or indirectly, the serving of any port within the continental limits of the United States located on any improvement project designed for the accommodation of ocean-going vessels authorized by the Congress or through it by any other agency of the Federal Government."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, section 1107 of the bill, which you have just heard read, authorizes these contract carriers that we expect to come into existence under the terms of this bill to enter into conference agreements. These conference agreements are entered into by steamships operating all over the oceans of the world and give the shipping industry a certain amount of independent self-government and coordination in the matters of rates and services. Under Federal laws enacted by our Congress, these conference groups are relieved from the restraint of the Sherman and other antitrust acts. These conferences nearly always have a preponderance of foreign memberships. For instance, there is the Pacific Westbound Conference, operating on the Pacific Ocean; the Pacific European Conference; and I do not recall the names of all of the Atlantic and Gulf coast conferences that operate, but you will find in every case that the predominant members and those who dictate the policies of the conferences are our foreign rivals. If we are proposing to subsidize both in construction and operation a merchant marine, financing it by Government money, it seems obvious to me we should not permit the dictation of policies of those American-owned vessels as far as their service to American ports of call is concerned by Europeans or orientals in these conferences.

On the Pacific coast there exists discrimination in the matter of service against a number of ports, including the Port of Stockton, which is in my district. The Pacific Coast European Conference has refused to make any rates to that port. It is not the only port discriminated against. There are also San Diego; Sacramento; Vancouver, Wash.; Long Beach; Newport, R. I.; and various others. They have done this in spite of the fact that some of the members of the conference desire to serve the port of Stockton. These ports are all in a position to handle ocean-going ships and are ports on which the United States Government has spent large sums of money running, in the case of Stockton, into millions of dollars for the improvement of the channel. We are fearful that this same condition may exist with other conferences if American lines become members thereof and should want to make rates or provide service for the benefit of San Diego, Stockton, or these other ports, they could not do so if they were outvoted by the European lines, regardless of the fact that a representative of the authority might be sitting in at the conference.

The Legislature of the State of California at its last session adopted a joint resolution urging that the Congress, in connection with any legislation granting subsidies or assistance to American merchant marine, incorporate therein the provisions of the amendment which I have offered.

All this amendment proposes to do is to assure that no contract carrier shall receive a subsidy from the United States Government, either for construction or in operation, and, at the same time, yield to the dictates of those who are not interested in our merchant marine as to the service it may render to any port within the continental limits of the United States.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What does the bill do for the Great Lakes and great Middle West shipping?

Mr. BUCK. I understand they are not involved in this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As a practical matter what would happen if we should adopt the gentleman's amendment, and in the conference agreement they still left those ports the gentleman mentions without shipping service.

Mr. BUCK. As a practical matter it would result in the withdrawal of the approval of the Authority created by this bill for American vessels to participate in such conference.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would not that be discriminating against the people in our country who desire to engage in shipping, simply because of some burden imposed on them by virtue of European influence.

Mr. BUCK. I do not know that I follow the gentleman in that question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the European influence sets forth the ports at which the members of the agreement may call, and then we say to our people, you cannot have the money if you enter into such an agreement, does not that automatically kill the effect of the bill?

Mr. BUCK. I do not think so. The effect of the bill is to give a subsidy to construct these ships and see that service is maintained for the benefit of our own ports. It certainly is discrimination against any port of the United States if it is not allowed service by vessels which are financed by the United States Government.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and wish to be notified when I have used 2 minutes as the gentleman from California [Mr. BURNHAM] wishes to speak upon this amendment. There is possibly, and I think probably, some merit in the contention of these gentlemen. I do not think it ought to be brought into this bill. I believe that the Shipping Act of 1916 provides a remedy, in hearings before the Board, and in addition to that we have provided in this act that there shall be representatives of the Government in all those conferences, and I think that through the agency of those representatives, and the remedies that now exist, relief can be had, and it would be much better worked out in that way than by making it affirmative legislation.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by my colleague from California [Mr. BUCK] is vitally important to the city and port of San Diego, against which there is assessed an arbitrary of $2.50 per ton. A number of other ports have also been discriminated against by the attitude particularly of the Trans-Pacific Conference, called the "Pacific West-bound Conference" and the "Pacific European Conference." Most of their members are alien-flag lines, who have ruled that ships may no longer call at the port of San Diego to lift foreign cargo unless there is a sufficient cargo to produce a revenue of $1,500 for each ship.

The effect is to shut off recently developed trade in fruit juices and extracts from this port to London, which has been bringing at least one ship a month into San Diego, providing needed addition to the port revenues and income of local stevedores. As there never has been such a shipment coming up to $1,500 revenue and there is little likelihood of the possibility of concentrating enough cargo to reach that figure, it virtually shuts out this form of foreign trade. The question of discriminating against San Diego by steamship conferences has been one of long standing. Shipments bound to the Orient may call at San Diego to lift two commodities, scrap iron and bulk gypsum, but if they lift any other cargo in port they must add a penalty of $2.50 per ton, described as an arbitrary, which, to my mind and to the mind of every other fair-thinking man, is absolutely unfair and discriminatory.

San Diego is entitled to ship from its own port the commerce that has developed there. Many steamship companies would like to call there, but are prevented from doing so by the rulings of the conference. All we ask for the port of San Diego is adequate service and equitable rates.

The Senate and Assembly of the State of California have unanimously adopted resolutions memorializing Congress to adopt this amendment to the bill under consideration. The city of San Diego has spent millions of dollars in providing modern docking facilities, and the Federal Government has recognized the harbor of San Diego, both from the standpoint of commerce and national defense. It is vital to the future of San Diego and the surrounding territory, as well as other ports subject to the same discrimination, that relief be given.

I ask that this amendment be given serious and favorable consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. BURNHAM] has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1109. The Authority shall have full power and authority to use any funds not specifically designated for other purposes to give in such manner as it deems advisable aid and support to the holder of any contract under this act, in meeting any unfair competition or practice by any foreign vessel or vessels.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORAN: Page 68, line 4, strike out section 1109, beginning in line 4 and ending with line 9.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, the mere reading of this particular section, it seems to me, ought to insure the elimination of it. It reads:

The Authority shall have full power and authority to use any funds not specifically designated for other purposes to give in such manner as it deems advisable aid and support to the holder of any contract under this act, in meeting any unfair competition or practice by any foreign vessel or vessels.

In other words, a subsidy without limit, a subsidy without restrictions, and no guard whatever against favoritism.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. If the House and Senate, supposed to be the legislative branch of the Government, do not have time or sufficient interest to give any more careful consideration to legislation than that, and turn it over to a board to just scoop it out of the Treasury as they see fit, does not the gentleman think we had better quit and go home?

Mr. MORAN. I will say this is one of the very worst sections in the entire bill. We hear about our committee trying to figure out what to do; we hear about the system of trying to work out a subsidy to help the American merchant marine. If the best we can do, after we get all through, is to say that this Authority can spend any sum it wants to, and give it to anyone it wants to, meeting any unfair practice it wants to, then it seems to me we might as well quit.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is not that the same authority which was given the President of the United States with reference to the $4,800,000,000 funds?

Mr. MORAN. But this is a matter of no limit whatever. With regard to the $4,800,000,000 there was that limit, but there is no limit in this ship subsidy bill at all.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. I would say that the authority which was given to the President was for the relief of human beings. This is for the relief of the millionaire Shipbuilding Trust. That is the difference.

Mr. McFARLANE. The experience we had under the Jones-White Act of 1928 shows that millions of dollars were made by these shipping concerns under that act. This act is far more unlimited than that act.

Mr. MORAN. Absolutely.

One final thing. The matter of the administration's attitude has been discussed time without number. This morning in the President's press conference he stated, when asked in open-press conference, that he had not endorsed any specific merchant-marine bill. There is the answer from the President himself today. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The statement has never been made by me or anybody on the floor that the President has seen this bill or endorsed it. The statement was made that it was endorsed by the Secretary of Commerce. The President sent his message here and we wrote a bill which we tried to bring within the terms of his message. For my part I have not yet, in the preparation of legislation, run down with a bill and handed it to the President, taking up his time by asking, "Mr. President, do you agree with this?" I have always held that the Congress should write legislation. [Applause.]

As for this particular provision, the funds must be those that are not specifically authorized or designated for any other purpose. That is the limitation. The purpose of it is to use as a threat against foreign ships if they want to pursue unfair methods, that Uncle Sam is going to meet them and is going to preserve his merchant marine, not to meet them by unfair methods but to meet them by fair and legitimate methods, to stop unfair competition.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 2 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, this section was inserted for the purpose of enabling the maritime authority to back up our merchant marine when it is specifically and unfairly attacked by any particular foreign shipping interests. Some years ago our coastwise trade which, under the law, belonged to Americans wholly, was interfered with by the device of running cruises from somewhere to nowhere and back again, trying to evade our coastwise laws by cutting into the overnight cruises that our American lines were running. There have been from time to time in specific services what are known as "fighting ships" sent by foreign lines, with or without the backing of foreign governments; and we do not propose to build up and maintain a merchant marine and take such unfair attacks lying down. This gives us the opportunity of fighting back. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORAN) there were—ayes 31, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that the amendment to strike out the enacting clause must be in writing.

The Clerk read as follows:

FALSE BILLING

SEC. 1110. The Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting after section 16 a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 16A. Any shipper, consignor, consignee, forwarder, broker, or other person, or any officer, agent, or employee thereof, who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false billing, false claim, false representation, or any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its officer, agent, or employee, obtain or attempt to obtain transportation for property by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act at less than the regular rates or charges then in force by such common carrier; or who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, by false claim, false representation, or other device or means, obtain, or attempt to obtain, any allowance, refund, or payment in connection with or growing out of the transportation of such property, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its officer, agent, or employee, whereby the compensation of such carrier shall be less than or different from the regular rates or charges in force by such common carrier at the time of such transportation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be subject for each offense to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000."

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. O'MALLEY moves to strike out the enacting clause of H. R. 8555.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order for it is not properly drawn, and, further, the motion cannot be made in the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The proper form of a motion to strike out the enacting clause is to move that the Committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The motion is not in proper form. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BLANTON. And now I offer one that is in proper form.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I love a good fight, and on this bill and its various provisions our good friends, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN], a splendid legislator, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN], another fine legislator, and our good friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY], another splendid legislator, have made a wonderfully good fight against it. We all appreciate the fight they have made. It is their conscientious belief that they are expressing in these various amendments; but they have found that the will of the House is against them, they have found on vote after vote that the majority of the Members present are not with them. What is the use of offering continually amendments that the members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union are not going to adopt.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I regret that I have not the time, else I would gladly yield.

Mr. Chairman, I am against all subsidies. I feel just like they do on some of these matters. I have never voted for subsidies. I am against subsidies just as my Democratic Party is against them.

What is the subsidy that is in this bill? Is it the kind that takes public money out of the Treasury and gives it to the rich? No, it is not. It is a subsidy that equalizes in favor of American labor the differences existing between wage scales in this country and foreign countries.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I cannot yield; I want to use my few minutes myself.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; I am. A motion to strike out the enacting clause embraces the whole bill on a subject as wide as from here to Michigan—the gentleman's State.

I am with labor when it is right; I am against labor when it is wrong. It is right for labor in the United States to ask for that which makes possible the American standard of living. That is all this bill does with respect to shipping—it makes good the extra cost of material in this country as against every foreign country in the world; it makes good the difference between what laborers in this country receive as against what laborers in every foreign country of the world receive; it protects our own labor in our own shipyards. The bill keeps those who load and unload ships from having to accept the peon wages paid in many countries of the world, and insures for all such labor our American standard of living.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield. I do not yield for any interruption.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, please do not take this out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman moved to strike out the enacting clause, but he is talking in favor of the bill. I think the gentleman should speak in support of his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to discuss the good qualities of the bill and the bad qualities of the bill, and do it in my own way.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But the gentleman is speaking in support of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I certainly know what is in order and what is not in order, and I will continue to proceed in order. [Laughter.]

What am I going to do under a situation such as faces me today when the chairman of a splendid committee of the House, Mr. BLAND, of Virginia, one of the leading Democrats of this House, who has served with efficiency and distinction for many years, brings in a bill favorably reported by 23 out of the 25 members of his committee? Because I am against subsidies am I going to vote against a bill which will help labor uphold the American standard of living? That is the question now before all of us.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOFFMAN and Mr. TRUAX objected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, this bill, as I have repeatedly stated, as nearly as it is possible for this committee to recommend, meets the wishes as expressed in the message of the President of the United States. We have pointed out that the failure to enact legislation for the benefit of the merchant marine will mean inevitably and very shortly that the merchant marine of America will pass from the seas. Without this aid those who have invested in ships in this country will build their ships abroad and over them they will fly a foreign flag.

We have repeatedly been told by officials of the Navy and by officials of the Government, and we know from our own practical experience in the World War, that we need a merchant marine. We saw the necessity for it then, when, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] said, we paid out millions to foreign countries. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I go further. If there had been expended by this Government even a reasonable amount for the maintenance of a merchant marine before the World War, I submit that the Kaiser would never have dared defy America. We would have been able to escape the necessity for that struggle. He would have known that we could carry our men and munitions.

Again, after the World War was over, there was demonstrated the importance of a merchant marine before a select committee of this House under the leadership of Mr. WHITE, or the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. LEHLBACH, but with no lesser gentlemen on the committee than the former distinguished chairman of this committee, Mr. Ewing L. Davis, who, reporting for that committee, said that in the trying time later, when there were not foreign ships to carry our material and our merchandise, we saved at least $600,000,000 in 1 year for the farmers of the Midwest and the farmers of the country as a whole.

Mr. Chairman, I go a step further than that. We have had it demonstrated that when America is not upon the seas the foreign countries, with their ships, can enter into their own conference agreements, fix their own rates, and transport our goods upon their own terms. I submit if we had not had our merchant marine since the war we would have paid out in increased freight rates alone enough to more than equal the expenditures we have made. There is every reason for an American merchant marine, and that is why the great President of the United States has announced boldly that there should be subsidies and that we should have a merchant marine. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to strike the enacting clause.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENALTY PROVISION

SEC. 1111. Whoever violates any provision of this act or any order promulgated by the United States Maritime Authority, except where a different penalty is provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not to exceed $5,000.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, if this was a bill primarily, solely, and wholly to help labor, I would be up here fighting for it. It is a little hard to reconcile the position which some have taken in favoring this measure when you put the yardstick behind their record on other matters. It is a little hard to reconcile the position which some Members of the House are taking on this measure at the present time when we think of the ten to twelve million souls in our country who cannot find honest employment. It is a little hard to think that a sensible Congress in such trying times as we have now will debate a bill like this with the serious thought of passing it, which hands out subsidies of an unlimited amount of money. And who will be benefited? The poor people? No; it will only mean more starvation and want for them, while a fretful Congress with little or no consideration extends another 2 years $500,000,000 more nuisance or sales tax, all of which is a consumption tax paid by the poor.

Who will be benefited by this bill? The very richest of the country. It has been pointed out that the little shipbuilder does not get any relief here. Who is going to get the relief? The very fellows who were made millionaires and multimillionaires out of the other Merchant Marine Act, who created the other scandals and who have robbed the Government in years gone by. They are the beneficiaries of this act. They are not through, and apparently they are still driving bargains, and it looks like they will put this bill over.

Are you going to be a party to it? Are your people back home, most of whom are barely getting by, who really need it, if anyone should receive a subsidy—are they asking for a subsidy? Would it not be far better for you as their Representative here to ask that the little business man and the fellow that is holding on merely by the skin of his teeth be given some consideration, and perhaps some little subsidy, rather than the multimillionaire and the very richest of this country? The latter ones are the ones who are being benefited under this act, and they alone.

The records show that labor has taken the rap on past legislation. You cannot deny that. Another body after debating the bill yesterday and today laid it aside. It was too hot for them.

What are you going to do about it? We are right near the close of the consideration of this bill. Is the House going to take this measure and pass it when we look back and see the 300,000 people of our respective districts who are today hungry and in need and when we know this opens up the Treasury in an unlimited way to the very rich of this country? Here in this bill you are giving unlimited subsidies to those who have and you are taking it away from those who have not. That is what we are doing. Nobody is going to be misled or deceived. It is the same old racket that has been going on here for years. Our party platform on this question provides that we should "revoke improvident subsidies granted to favorite interests."

This bill does not meet the requirements or the message of the President. His message and his position on this legislation have been repeatedly called to your attention today, and his position does not agree with the legislation this committee has submitted. You cannot come in here at this late time and say that you are standing on your own feet and writing a bill yourself. No. The Shipping Trust, that is the principal beneficiary, has come in here, and they have had a very large part in writing this bill, which is contrary to all the experience we have had all through the years with this kind of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask this committee just one question, and it is a simple question: Where do you go when you wish information? The last speaker has never been inside the committee room to talk about this particular bill; still he would appear here to give us a great deal of advice and tell us how we should conduct ourselves.

This bill aims at the very things he is talking about. We wish to give labor a chance. We are interested in labor. We want to create jobs, and we want to create them for Americans. We want to protect labor from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. We have had this waving of the flag, this shouting of the voice, and this carrying on from one extreme to the other until it becomes sickening to those who sit here and listen, as we have listened all this afternoon [Applause.]

SEC. 1113. When used in this act—

(a) The words "foreign trade" mean trade between the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the District of Columbia, and a foreign country.

(b) The term "citizen of the United States" includes a corporation, partnership, or association only if it is a citizen of the United States within the meaning of section 2 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 802).

(c) The term "person" includes corporations, partnerships, and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, or of any foreign country.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I rise to this point, Mr. Chairman, purely from this point of view. The question was asked a few moments ago by a new member of the Merchant Marine Committee, on which I had the pleasure to serve last Congress, where one should go for information on the subject. I would make the answer that the committee would have served itself, and the public interest, far better if it had gone to public officials of this Government, charged with carrying out the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, rather than to have gone to lobbyists like Ira Campbell. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman to state what single member of the Merchant Marine Committee, in connection with this bill or for any other purpose, has discussed it with Mr. Ira Campbell, or with any lobbyist whatsoever. So far as I am concerned, in the 18 years I have been a member of this committee, I have never seen Ira Campbell outside of the committee room, and I have never exchanged one single word with him in private, or with any lobbyist, and I know that the chairman of the committee and every member of the committee who has served with me in the past can say the same thing. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I would not think for a moment of referring to that famous Shakespearean expression, "Methinks the lady doth protest too much", because I made no such reference. I did not say that. I said the committee, and by that I mean that Mr. Campbell, lobbyist, appeared before the Merchant Marine Committee times without number in behalf of this bill and, in my opinion, a man with his background, with the connections he has had in connection with these contracts, should not be asked for information as compared with the officials of the Government charged with this responsibility.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I think the gentleman ought to state for the RECORD whether or not in his appearances before the committee, Mr. Ira Campbell favored this bill.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is important.

Mr. MORAN. The answer is that Mr. Campbell, of course, favored this bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, about 2½ months ago when the President's message was sent to the Merchant Marine Committee, the distinguished chairman of our committee, Mr. BLAND, consulted the members of the committee as to what should be the policy regarding the drafting of a bill. The President had sent no bill to the Congress. The Secretary of Commerce, the Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet, or no one else had sent a draft of a bill to the committee. It was my suggestion to the chairman of the committee that we hold informative meetings, inviting everyone that had any knowledge to offer to the Merchant Marine Committee to give us the benefit of his advice. For 4 long weeks we had men of every shade and variety come before our committee to give us the benefit of their constructive suggestions. We had the departments of the Government, we had labor, we had the victims of the Morro Castle and the Mohawk, we had newspaper representatives whom I brought there myself, we had the representatives of the steamship organizations, and after listening to them for almost 4 to 6 weeks, upon the recommendations and suggestions that were made, we authorized the chairman of our committee, after the hearings were printed, to formulate a bill that would meet the wishes and the ideas of the committee. The bill was prepared by the chairman of our committee.

This bill was brought before the committee, hearings were again held, to which everyone was again invited, and for the benefit of my colleagues I may say that I have no love, no admiration, and no respect for Ira Campbell as a lawyer of the great shipping interests. The record will show there was not a member of the committee that pulled Ira Campbell across the hurdles of fire as much as I did. However, I have a personal affection for him as a gentleman, and admire his great legal ability. I wish we had lawyers battling for the interests of our people as he so faithfully fought for the interests of his clients. But no Ira Campbell could write a bill for Dr. SIROVICH. I fought his measures. I fought his amendments, and I repeatedly succeeded in putting legislation in this bill that he was opposed to.

I think this bill represents the composite will of 21 of the 23 members that constitute the Committee on the Merchant Marine. Twenty-one voted for the passage of this bill, one voted "present", one voted against it, but voted for many features that are in the bill.

I do not pretend for a moment that everything in this bill is perfect, but it is the best we can get, and the finest we can have to make the American merchant marine the greatest among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 1116. The provisions of this act shall take effect 30 days after the date of its enactment except as otherwise provided in this act and except that section 201 shall take effect on such date.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, we are nearing the conclusion of debate on this bill. Evidently there is some difference of opinion among members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, with respect to the justification for opposition of the bill. I shall make no intimations with reference to the majority as were so recently directed at me. The criticism does not come with good grace when I was a consistent attendant at the deliberations on the pending measure, and am now, as then, offering amendments that, in my judgment, simply afford more adequate protection to the taxpayers who are going to pay this bill.

I want to say, as we near the conclusion, that there are some things that we must keep in mind constantly. Word has come to me today that in answer to a direct question put to him today as to whether or not he favored a specific merchant marine bill, the President of the United States answered "no." This should remove any doubt in the minds of Members that this might, as has been improperly contended here, be an administration bill.

I would remind this Committee that there are many established subsidies proposed in this bill which we have commented upon many times, and there is no limitation whatever upon the amount that may be appropriated under the provisions of the bill. I would remind you that a moment ago one Member said that if the bill is not passed the American merchant marine will pass from the seas. And yet in an introductory argument in behalf of the bill we heard the proponents of the measure state that the American merchant marine had practically passed away under the 1928 act, which contained the corrupt mail-subsidy program, provided for in title IV of the said act, that this proposed law does not repeal, and under which we have paid out $119,257,756.63 plus loans for shipbuilding at interest rates as low as one-eighth of 1 percent, and evidently to no avail. The only reason the bill under consideration might be more successful is that it opens the Treasury door vastly wider.

The 1928 act, including title IV, under which this very subsidy has been granted, is continued by the terms of this bill and not repealed, as requested by the Postmaster General and intimated to be necessary by the President of the United States.

I would remind you that this vast program of subsidies includes permissive authority. I know that meets the approval of members of the shipping interests or their lieutenants, such as Mr. Ira H. Campbell, who appeared before the committee and endorsed the bill—that is, the earliest of the committee prints, containing fundamentally the same subsidy provisions that appear in the final draft of the measure we are considering now.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Iowa knows that the particular bill before the committee when Mr. Campbell appeared is not the bill under consideration. Many amendments were offered, and the bill has been materially and substantially changed.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman is correct, but the major subsidies were in the bill at the time, and they are in this bill.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, can the gentleman tell us, as a member of the committee, how many suggestions made by Mr. Campbell have been incorporated in this bill?

Mr. WEARIN. Oh, an untold number of them. In concluding, I would remind you that at the present time a report from another body, under the chairmanship of a distinguished Member thereof, recently states that where the Government has as vast an interest invested as it has in the shipping industry in the United States, under the terms of this bill or under the 1928 act, the Government should not release its hold upon its title to the ships. [Applause.]

When as under the terms of this bill it is going to loan what will amount to approximately 88 percent of the cost of the ships and accept a trade-in of obsolete bottoms as part payment, it should continue in possession of them and do no more than lease them to private operators upon a charter-hire basis. Personally I would prefer to see a privately owned and operated merchant marine, if the ship operators were in a position to supply it, but they claim that they are not in a position to do so. The hearings before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, copies of which seem to be quite rare, will bear out this fact.

Of course, when anyone mentions the possibility of Government ownership and private operation upon a charter-hire basis, or profit-sharing basis permitting no more than a reasonable profit for private interests, there is always a hue and cry from the ship operators who desire the benefit from various indefinite subsidies such as those provided in the bill we are discussing and other interests that such a program would involve the inefficiency that has been unjustly attributed to previous activities of the Government in that same field.

I gave the House an example of what the Government has been able to do along the line I have suggested in the minority views of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but I repeat that even where the Government has gone to the extent of operation there have been no excessive losses, considering the circumstances that surrounded the activity. The Government has been required to take the blame for the expense of developing trade routes that were afterward turned over to private operators and from which they have been able to benefit exclusively. It has also been charged with the expense of writing down the cost of ships for the benefit of private operators, as I have previously indicated in my reply a few moments ago to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The opposition to this bill has never recommended Government ownership and operation. We do believe that if we are going to subsidize a merchant marine to the extent of financing practically all of the construction costs and offer various subsidies the amount of which cannot even be estimated, the Government had better retain title to the ships and lease them to the operators on a charter-hire, profit-sharing basis. We should not permit a red flag to be waved at us upon this point. I might remind the House again of the fact that even Government ownership and operation have in the case of the United States Lines proved quite profitable. After spending $5,565,327.05 during a period of 4 years in the development and operation of the line in a manner similar to the development of lines privately operated, the Government for the fiscal year 1927 showed a profit of $404,017.12 in the operation of the line. During the same period so-called "private operations" on other Government-owned lines operated for private profit, cost the taxpayers $9,283,035.31. This incident preceded the decline in maritime business conditions. The line referred to was sold to private interests in 1929 and has been privately operated since that time with the aid of huge grants of mail pay. We cannot draw from this example of true Government ownership and operation that it is impractical, but, on the other hand, demonstrates that true Government operation, under ordinary business conditions, has been and can be profitable.

The bill now being considered should be decisively defeated because of the unlimited subsidies that can be paid under it without any definite assurance that we will, as a result of such a spending orgy, have a merchant marine any more adequate than the one we have sailing the seas today after the excessive subsidies paid out under the 1928 act. The measure might be recommitted to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. In the event such latter action is taken, it is to be hoped that the recommendations of President Roosevelt, based upon the findings of the investigation of air and ocean mail contracts by Postmaster General Farley, will be followed more closely if we are to have a subsidized merchant marine, and, furthermore, that the suggestions of the special committee of the United States Senate be given every consideration in view of the fact that private operators admit they are not in a position to finance the building or operation of an American merchant marine.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN] have made a valiant fight for a principle with which I do not think the Congress of the United States agrees. They are fighting for Government ownership. That is the real basis of their fight, and the idea was sold to them by men connected with the Black investigating committee. I say that advisedly, because the same men tried to sell me the idea. I do not criticize them, nor do I impugn their motives, but I say to my fellow Members that this bill was considered for more than 2 months. We have hearings printed in a volume containing 1,000 pages. Everybody who wanted to be heard was given that opportunity. The committee took the recommendations of the President and of the departments affected; we took the evidence of the witnesses and weighed these proposals pro and con and made up our own minds about what sort of bill we wanted to bring in; and that is my idea of the proper method of legislating in the National Congress.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I cannot. Now, we are up against this proposition. I am supporting this bill primarily for two reasons: First, because it is in the interest of national defense. Anybody familiar with the experience of this country during the World War knows that the most pressing problem America had was to get supplies and troops to Europe, and we had to use foreign ships in which to do it. Second, I support this legislation because only through some subsidy can we hope to build ships in American shipyards with American labor, and I call attention to the fact that the bill contains a provision for the prevailing wage scale and for the use of American materials, both in the manufacture and in the operation of these ships.

I do not appreciate the insinuations cast against this committee and its action by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN], and I am not concerned about the charge that the President of the United States has not endorsed the bill. I never have and I never expect to ask him what I ought to do as a Member of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. WEARIN. Does not the gentleman from Georgia realize that many of the suggestions favored by the shipping interests have been written into this bill, as they proposed them before the Committee on Merchant Marine?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They may have favored them, but they were not written in there because of anything they said, but because of the judgment of the committee and over the protest of the gentleman from Iowa, who was given every opportunity in the world to present his views of Government ownership.

Mr. WEARIN. That is what I am saying, that the committee put in these things favored by the shipping interests.

Mr. RAMSPECK. But the gentleman has charged this committee with letting lobbyists write the bill, and there is not a word of truth in it and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. WEARIN. No; I don't know it.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. What percentage of the total cost of these ships is now going to be borne by the Government under this bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That will be left to the authority, and will depend upon the cost of building the same ships under the same plans and specifications in Europe.

Mr. KELLER. Is it true that about 85 percent of the total cost will be borne by the Government?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is not correct.

Mr. KELLER. Then what percentage?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The difference between the cost of building a ship here and abroad will be the subsidy. The gentleman is now confusing the rest of it with the loan provision in the bill, which permits, but which is not mandatory, the making of a loan by the Government for construction purposes up to 75 percent.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 1117. This act may be cited as the "Merchant Marine Act, 1935."

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this to take a moment of time of the House to thank the Members here today who remained so faithfully in an effort to stop the waste of time and who have stayed here so that we might have a full vote and make a roll call unnecessary.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, and, pursuant to House Resolution 275, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed bill as amended, but I will withhold that request——

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been ordered engrossed yet.

The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed bill. I do that for the purpose——

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I object to any debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order at this time, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I demand the reading of the engrossed copy.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H. R. 8555

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, the President's message of March 4, 1935, requested that the Congress pass new shipping legislation as a result of the startling revelations in connection with the administration of the ship-subsidy and ocean mail contracts as reflected by the report of Postmaster General Farley dated January 11, 1935, to the President, the printed record of the hearings before the special Senate committee headed by Senator BLACK, and the known facts regarding the existing conditions and the administration of the Merchant Marine Act.

Chairman BLAND in discussing this bill—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 25, 1935, page 10086—said:

In two respects we have departed from the message of the President. I shall discuss them before going into a discussion of the details of the bill.

It would appear that Secretary Roper could only detect two violations of the President's message, if I interpret correctly the Secretary's letter to Chairman BLAND, dated June 14, 1935, and printed on page 18 of Report 1277, relating to this bill. It, nevertheless, should appear obvious to anyone reading carefully the President's message and this bill that there are at least four major violations. I quote from the minority views, page 34 of Report 1277:

(1) The President, in his message to Congress, condemned the practice of lending Government money for shipbuilding, stating that in practice this policy has been a failure; this bill continues and enlarges upon this condemned practice.

(2) The President proposed that we end the subterfuge of mail contracts as rapidly as possible; this bill gives no assurance that existing ocean mail contracts will be terminated prior to their respective contractual expiration dates.

(3) The President stated that some American shipping companies have engaged in practices and abuses which should, and must be, ended, such as improper operating of subsidiary companies, excessive salaries, the engaging in business not directly a part of shipping, and other abuses which have resulted in poor management and improper use of profits; discretionary termination of these abuses as provided in this bill does not positively end these practices as insisted upon by the President.

(4) The President stated that quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative duties of the present Shipping Board Bureau of the Department of Commerce should be transferred for the present to the Interstate Commerce Commission; this bill fails to comply with that important recommendation.

Chairman BLAND, as a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, was apparently in accord with the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, which has proven such a miserable failure.

The following is taken from the RECORD of May 5, 1928, pages 7897 and 7898, which comment occurred in connection with a discussion of the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 just prior to its passage:

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. * * * This is a great bill; a great constructive measure. * * *

Immediately following this, gentlemen, was the distinguished chairman, Mr. BLAND:

Mr. Chairman, I approve of everything that has been said by the gentleman from New York. * * *

After the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, the passage of which Chairman BLAND so heartily supported, has been in effect approximately 7 years, his committee has made the following significant observations (p. 10, rept. 1277):

The gravity of the situation becomes obvious when we consider that the useful life of a ship is 20 years. Our merchant marine today operating in the foreign trade of slightly less than 3,000,000 tons, includes 224 vessels of 1,400,000 tons which were purchased from the United States Government. There is a high percentage of old and obsolete vessels in the number. Of the 3,000,000 tons, there are about 1,900,000 tons having contracts for carrying mail; in other words, that are subsidized. At the end of 7 years, 86 percent in number and 77 percent in tonnage of the vessels now operating on ocean mail routes will have become 20 years old.

Mr. CULKIN, of New York, as a member of the committee and a supporter of this bill, stated—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 25, 1935, page 10096:

There is absolutely no question but what the operation of the subsidy principle in America has been very unfortunate, and that those who were the beneficiaries of it were definitely untrue to America and untrue to anything except their own pockets. I have spoken here on the floor before in favor of what I call a vigorous nationalism—a nationalism which takes into account first the needs of America. It is my belief that with a gross expenditure of $800,000,000 for shipping America should have her place today on the sea, but America has not got it because those who were the beneficiaries of these subsidies definitely violated the pledge they made to the Government when they accepted these benefits.

In this connection, I want to say that I have great faith in the integrity of this committee. I am a member of the committee. During the period of the hearings on this measure, unfortunately, I was ill and unable to attend and become familiar with some of the problems presented by this bill.

It is my hope that the corrupt acts so feelingly referred to by the eloquent and able gentleman from Maine will never occur again. If they do, in my judgment, someone should be shot summarily at dawn.

If this Congress had the courage to pass an honest piece of shipping legislation clearly in the public interest "that meant what it said and said what it meant", the necessity for shooting people at dawn might be avoided. Under this weasel-worded, cowardly, special shipping-interest piece of legislation I fear, however, it will be necessary to shoot the entire shipping industry in the course of a few years if Mr. CULKINS threat is carried out. If we are to judge the future by the past, this bill is conducive to fraud, corruption, favoritism, and failure even more so than the 1928 act, because the avenues for penetrating the Treasury have been increased fourfold—see Mr. WEARIN'S remarks, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 25, 1935, on page 10089—and not one single prohibition has been issued against the abuses of the past. In every instance, instead of meeting the issue squarely by issuing a mandate against these abuses, the bill implies that the same old racket in amplified and aggravated form may, and no doubt will, exist with the consent of the Authority. After 15 years of racketeering under the 1920 and 1928 acts, how could any sane person expect an improvement unless the Congress has the courage to pass a decent law. The lobbyist and the so-called "high-pressured shipping magnates" would turn the world upside down, if possible, to get weak men on the authority, or to make strong men weak under a wide-open law like this.

When the chairman reported this bill out of the committee he apparently did not feel as certain of its soundness as he did of the 1928 act. I quote from Report No. 1277, relating to this bill, page 18:

This committee, meeting in daily session and for long hours for many weeks, has wrestled with this merchant-marine problem in its many phases. We submit the bill (H. R. 8555) as the best solution we can offer. The bill may have imperfections. If so, time will reveal them and Congress will promptly correct them. Perfection is not an attribute of mortals, and cannot be of their products. We confidently believe that this bill will prove a long step forward in preserving the American flag upon the seas, and will provide ships to serve for national defense in time of emergency and for promotion of commerce in time of peace.

THE LOBBYISTS TAKE CHARGE

I do not wonder that it is thought there may be imperfections when all of the old subsidies have been retained and nine or more additional subsidies have been added without providing any of the safeguards demanded by the President, the necessity for which has been so definitely and clearly pointed out by the President, as well as the Senate's and Postmaster General's reports. Why did this committee turn its back on the reports of the special Senate committee and the Postmaster General when the authenticity of the damaging information contained therein stands unrefuted, and look to lobbyists like Ira Campbell for guidance? In case you do not know who Ira Campbell is, I shall quote for your benefit from an editorial in the New York World-Telegram, dated June 8, 1935:

[From the New York World-Telegram, June 8, 1935]

WHO IS MR. CAMPBELL?

Representative SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, Chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee, has been showing a touching tenderness for the opinions of one Mr. Campbell in the committee's deliberations on the Sirovich bill designed to make shipowners pay for lives lost at sea and help prevent more Vestris, Morro Castle, and Mohawk disasters.

Frequently Committee Chairman BLAND, of Newport News, shipbuilding center, has interrupted proceedings to say that Mr. Campbell would not approve of this or that suggestion for new sea safety by different committee members. Representative WELCH finally shouted, "Who is Mr. Campbell?"

The answer is that Mr. Campbell, Christian name Ira, is counsel to the American Steamship Owners' Association and chief lobbyist for the shipping interests. Which may or may not make it surprising that he should be so tenderly protected by the chairman of a House committee reasonably expected to prevent the present dice loading against disaster victims.

Despite Mr. Campbell's position as Chairman BLAND'S ear, and despite Mr. BLAND'S previous view that the bill was trivial, that not enough lives are lost at sea to warrant taking up the Congressmen's valuable time, the committee is now on the point of favorably reporting Representative SIROVICH'S bill.

Meantime we believe that the House of Representatives should not rest with a mere inquiry by one Congressman as to who Mr. Campbell is. The House ought to expose the whole rotten system whereby lobbyists are tolerated to the point that the chairman of a powerful committee would complain that a given lobbyist would not approve of suggestions being made in the public interest by committee members.

I shall also quote a leter from Mr. C. L. Bardo, vice president of the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation, an affiliate of the New York Shipbuilding Co., Camden, N. J., to Mr. Homer Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., Newport News, Va., which was printed in the hearings on H. R. 7521, now H. R. 8555, pages 683 and 684:

Mr. MORAN. The letter reads:

"DEAR MR. FERGUSON: The Jones-White merchant marine bill as passed by the last Congress is the most helpful and constructive national shipping legislation ever presented to the American shipping public. This legislation was only made possible by the energetic action of Mr. Wilder and his associates in the transoceanic enterprise, with the help and cooperation of other shipping and shipbuilding interests."

The CHAIRMAN. He had nothing to do with it.

Mr. MORAN. I was merely quoting the letter there, and this letter has been developed in that investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not care what has been developed in that investigation; he had nothing to do with it.

Mr. MORAN (reading):

"As a direct result of the passage of the Jones-White bill, a number of remunerative foreign mail routes have been advertised and some contracts let. A number of new ships are under active negotiation to build.

"This activity was carried on in the interests of the shipper, shipbuilder, shipowner, and suppliers of materials used in ship construction. The vision of the 4-day high-speed transoceanic liners made an effective background for this legislation. Several months were spent in Washington by Mr. Wilder and his staff, explaining and educating Congress as to the need of an adequate merchant marine, privately owned and operated. The expenses incident to this effort were approximately as follows:

Publicity and advertising	$38,000
Salaries of staff solely engaged in M. M. legislation duties and for reports submitted	32,000
Services of experts	26,000
Hotel expenses at Washington	23,000
Office expenses	12,000
Traveling expenses	15,000
Miscellaneous (printing, telephone, telegraph, photos, etc.)	4,000
	150,000

"EVERY SINGLE DOLLAR OF THIS EXPENDITURE WAS SPENT LEGITIMATELY

"The board of directors of American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation have assumed these obligations without any assurance as to reimbursement, but with an abiding faith in the fairness of others whose interests have been so materially helped by this legislation. As stated to you recently, we are hopeful that others whose interests have been so vitally helped will contribute to a fund of $100,000, which will leave the American Brown Boveri Corporation to carry $50,000 of the direct out-of-pocket expenses and $56,000 for transoceanic development.

"On the $100,000 basis, your proportion as nearly as we can estimate it upon the division of ship costs would be $15,000.

"The other contributors who have been solicited are as follows:

"American Engineering Co., Babcock & Wilcox Co., Bath Iron Works, Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, De Laval Steam Turbine Co., Federal Shipbuilding Co., General Electric Co., Hyde Windlass Co., Pusey & Jones, Sperry Gyroscope Co., Sun Shipbuilding Co., Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., Worthington Pump & Machinery Corporation.

"I would very much appreciate the courtesy of an early reply.

"Checks should be made payable to the company and forwarded to the offices at Camden, N. J.

"Very truly yours,

"C. L. BARDO, Vice President."

If these kind and benevolent gentlemen spent $150,000 "educating Congress" to swallow the 1928 act, it makes one wonder how many hundreds of thousands of dollars of mail-contract money has been spent in "educating Congress" to accept H. R. 8555, which is far more iniquitous. What is wrong with the bill? It would be much easier to tell you what is right with it. The minority views very intelligently outline many of its defects. I quote from Report 1277, under "Minority views", beginning on page 34:

IT FAILS TO CORRECT EVILS DISCLOSED BY THE SENATE AND BY POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY AND DENOUNCED BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

(1) There is no provision in the proposed measure that will prevent a continuation of the low wages paid to American seamen whilst the officers and stockholders draw exorbitant salaries and fat dividends from the United States Treasury via the subsidy route, notwithstanding the fact that seamen's wages are argued as the most important reason for granting any operating subsidy or bounty.

Amendments were offered from the floor at the insistence of Mr. CONNERY, of Massachusetts, to correct this abuse, and the amendments were adopted.

(2) The proposed law contains no mandate against a recurrence of a steamship corporation drawing hundreds of thousands and millions of taxpayers' dollars as an aid to earning 20, 30, even 50 percent annual profits on their net invested capital while operating under the dole system.

(3) A supine admonition against holding companies, subsidiary companies, affiliated companies, and associated companies can and may be ignored by two understandable methods. First, the proposed maritime authority has permissive power to approve these complicated, puzzling, deceptive networks of corporate fiction that now exist, comparable to utility-holding companies. A second possible method is a repetition of that recently disclosed system of placing the capital stock of affiliated companies in the name of a wife or other family member.

(4) The bill contains no mandatory prohibition against exorbitant salaries which may be received by officers of subsidized steamship corporations by means of the simple expedient of drawing salaries from affiliated or associated companies that secure revenues from subsidized operators.

(5) Despite recent disclosures as to subsidized corporations dividing efforts between the operation of American-flag ships and foreign-flag ships, this measure delegates permissive power to the proposed maritime authority to countenance a continuation of this unsound policy. The expenditure of the American taxpayers' money to aid in operation of foreign ships certainly will not build an American merchant marine. Foreign-flag ships mean low wages and depress wages on American-flag ships.

(6) This proposed measure permits continuation of the unsound policy of subsidies to intercoastal operators who go through the subterfuge of merely stopping at a foreign port en route, such as Habana, Cuba; Cristobal or Balboa, Canal Zone; for the incidental transaction of business, thus placing subsidized American lines in unfair competition with unsubsidized American lines, unless it is proposed to subsidize all intercoastal operators.

(7) There is nothing in this bill to prevent the payment of subsidies to industrial giants that transport their own products in their own ships. It is impossible to justify the disbursement of taxpayers' money to aid a huge oil, steel, or any other industrial corporation in the transportation of its own products in its own vessels.

IT GIVES NO ASSURANCE THAT ITS ASSERTED POLICY OF PROVIDING AN ADEQUATE MERCHANT MARINE CAN BE REALIZED

This bill has the fatal weakness of depending upon the present deplorable financial condition of steamship companies, as evidenced by the excessively liberal benefits offered. Although it provides for the Government donating and loaning a greater percentage than at present in new ships, there is no assurance that private industry will exert sufficient initiative or has the financial resources to take advantage of what is merely an extended opportunity to proceed with a construction program with the view toward creating and perpetuating an American merchant marine. At best, the bill contemplates extending more liberal aid for a construction program than is now afforded for those, if any, who see fit and are financially able to construct new ships.

IV. IT IS INCAPABLE OF EFFICIENT ADMINISTRATION AND INVITES MALADMINISTRATION

(1) Neither the immediate nor ultimate total burden on the taxpayer is known or ascertainable. No proponent of this bill can state even its approximate cost to the American taxpayer. There is no limit to the amount that may be paid to any one operator and there is no limit to the total cost of the bill.

(2) The method by which both the construction subsidy and the operating subsidy are to be computed is unworkable and productive of fraud. The provisions of the bill presume that an agency of this Government will be able to determine accurately not only labor and material costs in foreign shipyards, but also justified and honest overhead expenses in such foreign countries. The bill further presumes the possibility of an agency of this Government ascertaining all operating costs of foreign ships operated by foreign citizens whose records are kept in foreign countries. The actual experience of the Tariff Commission has demonstrated the practical impossibility of determining foreign costs. Even if it were possible to secure such information in foreign countries on an accurate basis, it is manifest that the costs of foreign competitors will not only vary as between the different nations' ships, but will also fluctuate violently from month to month, week to week, and day to day.

(3) The bill does not contain a limitation of profits which may be earned by American shipyards. In this bill the principle of protective tariff reaches the zenith of an embargo. Under this bill American shipbuilders could be paid whatever price they demand, irrespective of the justification for such price being greater than would be charged in a foreign shipyard. It is proposed that the Government shall pay an outright bounty to the American shipyard wherein new vessels are constructed, which shall be the estimated differential between American costs and foreign costs. If this differential permits the shipyard to pay fat dividends to its stockholders, exorbitant salaries to its officials, and corrupting expense accounts to its lobbyists, the Government has no recourse and is not in a position to recapture these unearned profits.

(4) The essential correlary of any subsidy system, in the public interest, is a recapture provision. There is no such provision in this bill.

(5) This bill contains no provision to terminate the present unconscionable practice of use of taxpayers' money by high-priced lobbyists and "fixers" as so recently disclosed on pages 683, 684, 635, and 898 of the hearings before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

(6) It would be possible for an officer or employee of a subsidized shipping company or of an affiliated, subsidiary, or holding company of such a subsidized corporation to stand as a candidate for membership on the proposed United States maritime authority, which agency would have supervision of the disbursement of the proposed subsidies. Congress should prohibit this possibility by statute.

This expression of minority views is submitted to the Congress as a forerunner to amendments that will be offered on the floor designed to correct some of the evils referred to and to safeguard the public interest as far as possible under the fundamentally unsound principles of this bill.

In discussing the Copeland-Bland bill on June 25, 1935, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have not had a chance completely and thoroughly to investigate this bill; but I desire to say that a very thorough investigation should be made of the wisdom of passing the bill, because, as I read the measure, it is inconceivable to me that the Congress of the United States will pass a bill containing the provisions found in this one.

The bill provides, among other things, for financial aid to the merchant marine. As I read the report on the bill, it would indicate that the President of the United States favors the bill set out; but if Senators will analyze the message which the President sent to Congress, I am sure they will readily agree that there is no paragraph in the President's message which would indicate in the slightest degree that he favors any subsidy such as that which is set forth in the bill.

We have had a great many governmental scandals in connection with subsidies, particularly mail and shipping subsidies. It seems to me this bill opens the way for the greatest scandals that have ever been perpetrated by any bureau or any department of the Government of the United States.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. We have before us at the present time a report from the Postmaster General saying that most of the present mail subsidy contracts are void; and he implies, if he does not say so absolutely outright, that many of them are fraudulent.

The Senator from Montana will remember that some years ago I had these contracts examined. I came to the same conclusion. I think they are all fraudulent and void except about three. They have not been canceled; and with that report coming in that they are fraudulent and void, or most of them are, the idea of Congress in that situation, before any adjustment is made, before the contracts are taken up, or certainly before their validity is determined, giving these very companies one of the most liberal subsidies in the world, seems to me to be absolutely inconceivable. I do not see how we could do it under the circumstances.

I have always been opposed to subsidies. I am opposed to them now; and I expect to vote against this bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the bill contains a provision for regulation, and also for carrying out both the executive and the legislative will.

In his message of March 4, 1935, to the Congress of the United States, the President said, among other things:

"Legislation providing for adequate aid to the American merchant marine should include not only adequate appropriation for such purposes and appropriate safeguards for its expenditure but a reorganization of the machinery for its administration. The quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative duties of the present Shipping Board Bureau of the Department of Commerce should be transferred for the present to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Purely administrative functions, however, such as information and planning, ship inspection, and the maintenance of aids to navigation, should, of course, remain in the Department of Commerce."

Of course, the bill does not purport to carry out the President's message with reference to that feature of the subject.

I desire briefly to call attention to a few of the provisions of the bill which I have hurriedly analyzed.

The bill creates another board of five members, with salaries of $12,000 a year each, and then provides that they may employ lawyers, experts, and so on. Then they are first to study and make an investigation of this whole problem. That would be perfectly proper if they stopped with the investigation and reported back to a subsequent Congress; but the bill goes on and says what?—"The authority is authorized and directed to consider the application"—of whom?—"of any citizen of the United States as defined in section 38 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 802), for financial aid in the construction, outfitting, and equipment of new vessels, or any vessels obligated to be built under an existing contract with the United States or the reconditioning of vessels already built, to be used on an essential service, route, or line in the foreign commerce of the United States. If the authority determines that (1) the service, route, or line requires a new vessel of modern and economical design or the reconditioning of a vessel already built, to meet competitive conditions or to further promote the foreign commerce of the United States, or if it is found after consultation with the Navy Department that the construction of such vessel is advisable for national-defense purposes; (2) the plans and specifications of the proposed vessel meet the requirements of commerce; and (3) the applicant possesses the ability, experience, financial resources, and character necessary successfully to operate and maintain such vessel in the proposed service, the authority shall, in accordance with the provisions of this act"—do what?—"(a) determine the difference between the domestic and foreign reconditioning cost of a vessel of the type proposed to be built, or the difference between the domestic and foreign reconditioning cost of a vessel of the type proposed to be reconditioned; (b) submit said plans and specifications to the Navy Department, which shall have the right to suggest such changes therein as it may deem necessary or proper in order that the proposed vessel may be adequate as a naval or military auxiliary and otherwise suitable for the use of the Government in case of national emergency or for the national defense.

"(B) In case the said specifications shall be approved by the authority and the Navy Department, the authority may grant a subsidy of such amount as will equal, but not exceed, the difference between "—what?—" the fair and reasonable cost of constructing, outfitting, and equipping or reconditioning of the said vessel in an American shipyard and the fair and reasonable cost of constructing, outfitting, and equipping or reconditioning the same, or an equivalent vessel, under "—what?—" under substantially the same specifications in a foreign shipyard of equal standing."

Just stop and think for a moment what that means! We will assume, for instance, that the authority first ascertain the cost of reconditioning a ship in England. They find that the cost of reconditioning the ship in England is about so much money. Then they say, "What will it cost in an American shipyard?" Then the Government of the United States proposes to pay the difference between those costs. The bill does not say that they shall be ships of identically the same specifications but "substantially the same specifications." Do not make any mistake at all about it! When the specifications of one of these ships are changed, it will be like changing the specifications of a block of buildings in the United States, or a big business house. I myself have had some experience along that line; and I found that when I was building a house, if I changed the specifications in the slightest degree, a tremendous amount was added to the cost.

So there is no protection whatever. In this bill there is absolutely no protection, because it is provided that the specifications shall be substantially the same.

What does "substantially the same" mean? It means anything. It throws the gates wide open for all kinds of graft and all kinds of corruption to creep in, even assuming that the Government of the United States wanted to undertake to pay the difference and say, "We are willing to pay the difference between the cost in Great Britain and the cost in the United States." We would leave it wide open for them to say, "These are substantially the same specifications," and consequently we would have graft.

Suppose the shipping board should say, for illustration, "You can have the ship built for $5,000,000 in Great Britain, but it will cost $10,000,000 in the United States." Then the Government of the United States pays that shipping outfit $5,000,000 more than it ought to have to pay. But suppose the shipowner said, "We can get this ship built in Japan for $2,000,000, and it would cost $10,000,000 in the United States." Then the Government of the United States, instead of paying $5,000,000 extra, would pay $8,000,000.

There is nothing to provide that the difference must be the difference in wages between this country and Canada, for instance, nothing to provide that the difference must be the same as the difference in the wages between the United States and England, or the wages in Germany and the United States, but it says in a foreign shipyard of equal standing.

Nobody would deny the fact that there are shipyards in Japan which would be considered of equal standing with shipyards in the United States, because they are turning out ships, according to the reports we are getting at the present time, which are comparable with ships built in the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I call the attention of the Senator to another difficulty at this particular point. So long as international exchange is a fluctuating item there is no way in the world by which we can tell for more than 24 hours whether the differential is five million, or eight million, or twenty million dollars.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course. Suppose the pound sterling should drop tomorrow, or that money should become cheap in Germany, or money should become cheap in Japan tomorrow, with the fluctuating currency. I submit that there is no possible way of telling what it will be.

We have talked about the difference between the cost of goods at home and abroad and have said that we should impose tariffs based upon the difference. There is no one on this floor who knows anything about that matter but who knows that we cannot find out the actual cost of the production of goods in foreign countries. It is an excellent theory, but when we come to investigate the costs in foreign countries, we find that it is a physical impossibility to get the facts.

Are we to say, "Here are the specifications", and are we to let bids, and say to England, "You can bid on this", and then let an American firm bid, and then say that we are going to build the identical ship in American shipyards?

Of course, the British are not going to bid, and the Japanese are not going to bid, under those circumstances, because they are not going to the trouble of sitting down and figuring out their costs when they know that after they have done it the bids will be rejected.

Mr. BONE. As I read the bill, on its face it appears to establish a board of five persons with apparent blanket authority to open the doors of the Treasury of the United States to an unlimited raid by private shipbuilders and private shipping operators. Since I have been in the Senate I believe I have not seen a piece of legislation which proposed to give five men such unlimited power as this bill proposes to give. There are no restrictions on the exercise of their judgment or on the exercise of their lack of judgment. If we are going to pass this kind of measure—and this is not said in a spirit of facetiousness—I should like to have my State enjoy some of the privileges, so that it might take money out of the Federal Treasury to help feed the poor there.

I do not believe the people of the country will ever have a piece of legislation proposed to them which is so flagrantly a proposal to raid on the United States Treasury. I cannot imagine Congress passing this kind of legislation. The records of the Black committee are so damning an indictment of this kind of business that at this time the bill constitutes a bold challenge thrown in the teeth of the hungry people of the Nation. We made multimillionaires overnight under the Jones-White Act of 1928. Men in my section of the country became multimillionaires almost overnight.

The Congress of the United States is doing a dangerous thing in flaunting this kind of a measure in the face of millions of people in the country who today do not know the meaning of economic security. We have no business to be doing this sort of thing. I do not know why the shipping business should not stand on its own feet altogether. There are thousands of little business men in the country who would not presume to come here and ask Members of the United States Senate to vote them a subsidy; and yet they have just as much right, measured by the standards of decency and fair play in business, to ask us to vote them subsidies out of the Treasury of the United States as have the shipping interests to come here and propose or suggest that we pass this kind of legislation.

When we get to the point where a shipping company, for hauling one letter across the ocean, receives sufficient to pay for the ship which hauled it, then the time has come to call a halt. It is time to call a halt before the people become so outraged because of this kind of business that they will send men to the Senate who do not entertain such views, which may not be a very happy day for some of the gentlemen who have enjoyed these largesses out of the Treasury.

Thus it is seen how loosely drawn the measure is and what unlimited invitations it issues to rob the Treasury.

THE PRESIDENT OPPOSED TO THIS BILL

During the discussion of this bill (H. R. 8555) we were given to understand that it was the administration's bill because it had been approved by the Secretary of Commerce. Notwithstanding the circulation of this false impression, which doubtless caused a lot of Members to vote for it, the following news article appeared in the Washington News under date of June 28, 1935:

ROOSEVELT REPORTED TO HAVE DEMANDED NEW SHIP MEASURE—BILL CARRYING GREATLY MODIFIED SUBSIDIES EXPECTED BY FOES TO BE SUBSTITUTED

President Roosevelt was reported today to have demanded a new merchant-marine bill to displace the Bland-Copeland measure, which the House passed yesterday by an 8-vote margin.

The President's reported opposition to the subsidy bill was said to explain the sudden withdrawal by Senator COPELAND (Democrat, of New York) of his motion to take up the bill, after he had discussed the measure for an hour in the Senate.

Opponents of the Bland-Copeland bill claimed that it was dead and that a bill carrying greatly modified subsidies would be substituted, and would have the President's active support.

Senator BLACK (Democrat, of Alabama) said today that Congress must pass a merchant-marine bill this session so that existing abuses may be abated. BLACK, who heads the Senate Ocean Mail Investigating Committee, said action also is necessary in order that existing contracts, which the Postmaster General has said should be canceled, can be revised.

Senators CLARK (Democrat, of Missouri) and BONE (Democrat, of Washington) warned that under the Bland-Copeland measure the Government would lose millions to ship operators if ships were taken over in case of war.

CLARK said it would be possible under the bill for an operator to put only $750,000 into a $10,000,000 ship, the Government providing the balance. Then, he said, if the Government later took over the ship, it would have to pay nearly $10,000,000 for it if the vessel were almost new.

Senator BONE has prepared an amendment limiting such payment to what the operator has actually invested of his own money.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL ON OCEAN MAIL SUBSIDIES

In regard to the mail pay during the 10-year periods of the 43 existing mail contracts, I quote from the report of Postmaster General Farley to the President, dated January 11, 1935:

Mail pay has constantly increased since the enactment of the 1928 act. The mail contracts for the fiscal year 1929 amounted to approximately $9,000,000; in 1930 they were $13,000,000; in 1931 they were $18,000,000; in 1932 they amounted to $22,000,000; in 1933, $26,000,000; and in 1934 they were $29,600,000. For 1935 they are estimated at $28,850,000. For 1936 the amount would have been $32,851,954 if the contractors were to receive the amounts due by reason of reclassification of ships, new ships, and full performance of the service; but the Budget Director disapproved of the increased allowance and recommended that the appropriation be continued as for the fiscal year 1935.

If the present contracts continue, there will have been paid thereunder the approximate total of $308,095,160.30. There has already been paid by the Post Office Department under these contracts the sum of $119,257,756.63 up to June 30, 1934, leaving the estimated amount for the balance of the terms of the present contracts at $188,837,403.67.

If the mail had been carried on a foreign-poundage basis up to June 30, 1934, the cost would have been $6,802,434.90; and if carried at the American poundage rate, the cost would have been $15,534,509.10. The difference between the American poundage rate and the amount actually paid could be called nothing except a direct subsidy paid with the expectation that it would be properly used in the building of a merchant marine. This has already amounted to more than $100,000,000, and during the life of the contracts the excess cost, or subsidy, will amount to around $268,000,000.

Since the above figures were compiled as of June 30, 1934, it is estimated that the balance that will fall due under these contracts after June 30, 1935, if they remain in force until their expiration dates, will total $160,000,000, more or less.

THE BLACK COMMITTEE ON OCEAN MAIL SUBSIDIES

I desire to quote from the Senate Report 898, covering the preliminary report of the Special Committee to Investigate Ocean and Air Mail Contracts, pages 2 and 3:

The subject of this investigation and report is the unsuccessful and tragically disappointing attempt of the United States to create and maintain an adequate privately owned American merchant marine. The American merchant marine is neither adequate nor is it in any true sense privately owned. Responsibility for this country's failure to secure that which it sought and for which it was willing to expend and has expended hundreds of millions of dollars' of taxpayers' money must lie at the door of three classes of people: First, the burden of costly failure rests upon the enactment of an ill-advised compromise law. Second, upon certain public officials who flagrantly betrayed their trust and maladministered those laws. Third, upon those individuals who publicly posing as patriots, prostituted those laws for their private profit.

It is painfully obvious that we have not an adequate merchant marine. Although the United States ranks third in tonnage engaged in the international carrying trade, it ranks fourth as to speed, and last among the principal maritime countries in regard to the age of its ships. Great Britain's combination passenger and cargo tonnage in vessels of 2,000 tons and over, under 10 years old, approximately trebles the like tonnage of the United States. Within the past 10 years we have built fewer modern cargo vessels of 2,000 tons and over than any country with pretensions to maritime standing—Spain alone excepted. Great Britain has 735 such modern cargo vessels; Japan has 74; and little Norway, within the last 10 years, has built 130, while the United States has built only 9 such ships.

Our merchant fleet is for the most part composed of 10-knot ships, which are woefully deficient if considered as potential naval auxiliaries. If every ship required by contracts let under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 should be constructed, and all ships now in use remain in the service, upon the expiration of the present mail contracts in 1943, only 65 of all these ships would be less than 17 years old at that time. There will be 156 of these ships which have exhausted their economic lives, and the remaining 112 will have an economic life of 3 years or less. This is the pitiful result of a program which involved the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and contemplated an American merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels, sufficient to carry the greater portion of the commerce of the United States and serve as a naval or military auxiliary: This result is failure. And when we bear in mind, as we must, that a merchant marine must renew itself continually if it is to remain a factor in national defense and international trade, the magnitude and pity of that failure is almost beyond belief.

Even the merchant marine we have cannot fairly be described as "privately owned." When all mail contractors (except for the industrial United Fruit Co.) are considered, it is found that the Government has "invested" by loans and ship-sale mortgages on contractors' vessels, one and thirty-nine hundredths times the stockholders' interest in their companies. This investment by the Government excludes more than $120,000,000 so-called "mail pay" and a similar expenditure under the managing operator agreements, which Government money is responsible for the major portion of the operators' present capital. Not only that, but Government liens on certain vessels amount to 60 percent of the fair value (cost less depreciation) of the whole fleet. This is a "rock-bottom" estimate of the Government's investment as it excludes $451,201,354.48 excess war-time construction cost over book value, and it also excludes $23,561,229.90, which represents the difference between the unrestricted value of the ships and their value in the restricted trades for which they were sold.

The foregoing is particularly enlightening with regard to the present predicament of our merchant marine and the reason therefor. The big question is, What does this bill do to correct this condition and improve the general situation? One is compelled to the conclusion, after careful study, that the bill fails to improve the situation in any way but would make bad matters worse, if such is possible.

This bill does not even cancel these fraudulent ocean mail contracts.

As an example of the atrocities of the past, I quote from Senate Report 898, pages 11 and 12:

NULLIFICATION OF COMPETITIVE BIDDING

It was contemplated by the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 that the Postmaster General should first determine what ocean mail routes should be established and certify them to the United States Shipping Board. The Shipping Board was then to determine and certify to the Postmaster General the type, size, speed, and other characteristics of the vessel which should be employed, the frequency and regularity of sailings and all other facts bearing upon the capacity of the vessels to meet the requirements of the service stated by the Postmaster General. Upon receipt of this certificate, the Postmaster General was to advertise and secure competitive bids for furnishing the service in question. What actually happened was this:

The agents, lobbyists, and representatives of steamship lines descended upon the Post Office Department, which, acting in startling harmony with these alert and affable spokesmen of privilege, speedily reached decisions as to the "mail route" to be established, the character of service to be demanded (always a service then being operated by the prospective contractor, or which it was fully prepared to operate and which, in many instances, as will be pointed out, it was then bound by guaranteed contract with the Government to operate for a term of years without additional aid in the form of mail pay), and the amount of compensation it was to receive. This procedure is in striking contrast to the expectation of Congress that this compensation was to be fixed by free competition between prospective contractors.

Having accomplished this preliminary spade work, the result of these cooperative labors was transmitted to the Shipping Board in the form of a "certification of the Postmaster General." This certification was accompanied by the representatives of the prospective contractors, who were equally at home in both places. Instantly and pliantly the Shipping Board "determined and certified" to the Postmaster General those things which the interdepartmental subcommittee and the prospective contractor had agreed upon in advance that the Shipping Board should certify. The route was then advertised and the contract let to the company, which had arranged in advance the service it was to render and the compensation it should receive. The Postmaster General has advised the President that 42 out of 43 active contracts are subject to cancelation, 40 of them because let in open defiance of the legal requirement for competitive bidding. This advice by the Postmaster General is based upon the transcript of evidence adduced before him, which is replete with proof that these contracts were regarded as the personal prerequisites of favored shipping interests, considered as "pie" and parceled out as such.

This was "competitive bidding" as practiced under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928. In fact, there was no competitive bidding. Officials and contractors combined to and did prevent it.

The above appears to be good and sufficient reason why the Congress should follow the President's advice and cancel these contracts forthwith. Yet this bill ignores the President's request and leaves the ocean mail contracts hanging fire. The Postmaster General advises us that these people have illegal contracts. Do not these facts alone place the Congress in position to dictate the terms under which they shall be dealt with?

The following quotation from Senate Report 898, page 13, should concern everyone who has the public interest at heart:

Flagrant abuse of the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 is found in the classification of vessels on the basis of speed without regard to tonnage. The section of the act providing for such classification was designed by Congress for use in extraordinary situations.

Instead of applying this provision only to situations for which it was designed, the officials administering the act seized upon it and utilized it as a method for paying a higher rate of compensation than Congress contemplated for ships of particular classifications. These unjustified and inexcusable classifications cost the Government, prior to January 1, 1935, not less than $15,429,658.50, and if the present contracts are continued and the minimum number of contract voyages made, will cost the Government in the future an additional sum of not less than $28,926,277.50.

Not satisfied with having paid these self-styled patriots over $15,000,000 that should not have gone to them, the advocates of this bill would make it possible to continue these contracts and for the present beneficiaries to receive an additional gratuity of over $28,000,000 or an overpayment of over $44,000,000 during the entire life of the contracts.

As an example of some of the vices disclosed in the administering of the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, I qoute from Report 898, pages 22 and 23:

HOLDING COMPANIES ARE DEVICES FOR FRAUD

Holding companies, subsidiaries, associates, affiliates, and what not have been used by shipping companies for the uniform purpose of siphoning the income of subsidized operating companies into the pockets of individuals. These complicated corporate subterfuges and devices met our investigators in practically every office. It sometimes required weeks and months even to find their names. Frequently they were only discovered from income-tax reports and from special written questionnaires requiring the names of companies supplying goods and services to the subsidized company. When discovered, it was always found that these corporate devices concealed salaries, bonuses, secret expenses, and purloined revenues, which in equity and good conscience should have remained in the treasury of the subsidized company. In few instances, if any, are there any legitimate or honest reasons for the existence of these complicated networks and corporate shells.

In these corporate webs men frequently hold offices in so many interrelated corporations and draw so many corporate salaries that it is difficult for them to remember the names of the corporations, the offices they hold, or the salaries they draw for services they do not perform. The printed evidence before the committee is filled with proof of this.

Under this bill (H. R. 8555) the same old racket may be continued, and doubtless would be continued in modernistic and futuristic form.

THE GRAFT INVOLVED

Under the 1920 and 1928 acts it has cost the Government close to a billion dollars to create and perpetuate these services now maintained by the present mail contractors. This sum is made up as follows, which figures are taken from the Senate and Post Office reports:

Difference between sales price of vessels and war-time construction cost	$450,000,000
Cost of maintaining lines on a managing-operator basis (the Government took the losses and the operator the profits) prior to sale	115,000,000
Pay under mail contracts	145,000,000
Unpaid ship-sales mortgages and construction-loan notes due the Government, over $15,000,000 of which is past due	[1] 112,000,000
Excess of average commercial interest rate over rate actually charged by the Government	35,000,000
Total	957,000,000

While the Government was losing millions of dollars and slowly but surely reaching our present sad predicament as concerns the status of our merchant marine, many of the present mail contractors, some of whom were formerly managing operators for the Government—on an "I take the profits and you take the losses" basis—made many millions of dollars on practically no capital and after high salaries, and so forth, had been paid.

For instance take the corporate wealth of the International Mercantile Marine and let us analyze some of its operations which are typical of many of the different concerns dealing with the Government in this regard.

The Roosevelt Steamship Co. (contractor on route 46) is a subsidiary of the International Mercantile Marine Co. As of December 31, 1933, the International Mercantile Marine Co. had invested in the United States Lines Co. (contractor on routes 43 and 44), $1,020,000. The Roosevelt Steamship Co. collects commissions of approximately 19 percent of gross voyage revenue (excluding mail) of vessels owned and controlled by the United States Lines Co. R. Stanley Dollar, when president of the United States Lines, testified that he knew of no other operating agreement in the United States amounting to as much as 15 percent. Commissions thus received by the Roosevelt Steamship Co. totaled $3,097,537.95 between December 8, 1931, and December 31, 1933, and, of this amount, $2,712,055.65 was paid by the Roosevelt Steamship Co. to the International Mercantile Marine. During the same period, the books of the United States Lines show a purported loss of $1,886,379.11.

The Roosevelt Steamship Co., having a capital stock of only $22,000, passed on to the International Mercantile Marine 90 percent of the gross commissions received for operating the vessels owned and controlled by the United States Lines, and retained for itself 10 percent and showed on its books a net profit, from this specific operation, between December 8, 1931, and December 31, 1933, of $237,648.23. The exact amount of profit to the International Mercantile Marine from this operation cannot be ascertained in view of the complicated and varied activities of this holding company.

The International Mercantile Marine Dock Co., a 100-percent owned subsidiary of the International Mercantile Marine Co., has a capitalization of $100. This dock company leases New York-Chelsea Piers 58 to 62, inclusive, on the North River for $384,500 per year. It subleases the piers to the International Mercantile Marine Co. and has operated the piers to serve its subsidiary and affiliated companies and the White Star Line almost exclusively.

The net profit to the International Mercantile Marine Co. from operation of these piers has been more than a half million dollars a year during the period of the mail contract. In 1932 the International Mercantile Marine Co. collected wharfage from subsidized companies as follows:

From the Atlantic Transport Co. of West Virginia (charterers of vessels operated under foreign ocean mail route 32)	$76,670
From the Roosevelt Steamship Co. (U. S. Shipping Board vessels)	95,367
From the United States Lines Co. (foreign ocean mail routes 43 and 44)	262,185
Total	434,222

It may be pointed out, incidentally, that the International Mercantile Marine has made substantial advances to its subsidiary, the Frederick Leyland & Co., Ltd., a British corporation, owner and operator of foreign-flag tonnage, which company suffered a net operating loss of $3,539,920.76 from 1928 to 1932, inclusive. As of December 31, 1932, this company was indebted to the International Mercantile Marine, on open account, in the amount of $3,800,000 and owed the British Government, under the Trades Facilities Act on construction loans, $436,500.

As another striking example, I quote first from Senate Report 898, page 5:

$500 INVESTMENT—$6,700,000 PROFIT

As an example, the operation of the Dollar interests by the Admiral Oriental Line may be pointed out. Service on this route was established by the Shipping Board in 1921 as the "Admiral Oriental Mail Line", with new ships constructed and paid for by the Government. The Admiral Oriental Line, which was organized on October 2, 1922, with a cash capital of $500 and notes given for capital stock in the amount of $499,500, began operating this line under a managing-operator agreement made on November 2, 1922, and it was operated under this and succeeding managing-operator agreements for 3 years and 5 months. During this period this private company realized in net profits from its operation of Government-owned vessels on this route the sum of $533,713.96, and also earned profits in the amount of $463,682.01 from operations largely made possible by the existence of the managing-operator agreements. During this period the notes given for capital stock were wholly retired by dividends from earnings. Subsequently, without investing a dollar in addition to the original $500, this company bought the line and certain ships from the Government and has earned net profits of $4,106,590.46 from the operation of vessels (including a mail-contract gratuity), making a total net operating profit of $4,640,204.42. This figure does not include $2,127,653.30, profits of the $500 company from other sources.

The above is one of the Dollar companies, which group of companies now have mail contracts with a total value of $40,000,000 or more, all of which are considered illegal by the Postmaster General. As another illustration, I quote from part III of the Farley reports, page 511:

Initial and only investment in the Lykes Steamship Cos., other than from subsequent profits derived from steamship operations, which investment was made in October 1918 (the agency contracts with the U. S. Shipping Board were signed by Lykes Bros., Inc.)	$115,439.13
Net profits before income tax from all steamship operations, including operations under mail contracts nos. 23 and 45, from October 1918 to June 30, 1933 (profit under mail contract no. 57 not determined as contract was not effective until Feb. 21, 1933)	6,625,936.00

[1] The companies in default are: The Dollar Steamship Line, the Tacoma Oriental Steamship Co., the American Line Steamship Corporation, and the Baltimore Mail Steamship Corporation, subsidiary and affiliated company of the International Mercantile & Marine Corporation, the Export Steamship Corporation, and the Munson Steamship Line.

Profits as above, after income tax, October 1918 to June 30, 1933 (see exhibit A attached, which reflects data taken from pp. 1364 and 1365 of pt. 3 of Senate hearings) ---------- 5,891,222.66

CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Assuming that the public interest at this time requires the expenditure of the Government funds to create and maintain an American merchant marine, the question immediately arises what method the Government shall use in providing for an adequate merchant marine. Several alternatives have been suggested:

First. Government ownership and operation.

Second. Government ownership and private operation, the operation to be subsidized on satisfactory necessary proof.

Third. Private ownership and private operation, the operation to be subsidized where proven necessary.

Up to the present the Government has undertaken to supply the difference between the cost of construction in American yards and the cost of construction abroad, without reference to whether or not the cost of construction in the American yard was just and equitable, as above shown. The cost of construction has been left entirely to the private operations and the private shipyard, and this has cost the taxpayers many hundreds of millions of dollars; and this bill opens the gate and throws the gate away to unlimited exploitation by any and all comers. It is obvious that there can be no justification for any such program. The existing program should immediately cease. Any future program adopted should amply protect the Government by retention of title for any money advanced for any kind of ship construction. If ships are to be constructed in private yards, proper safeguards for ample and adequate competition should be fully provided to insure protection to the Government. If honest competition cannot be had and it is determined that the Government should finance such ship construction, then it should be conducted in the Government shipyards.

I have never favored subsidizing the merchant marine. I do not believe it is necessary for us to do so at this time. I believe there are far more beneficial pieces of legislation for the rank and file of the people that will benefit all people more than subsidy legislation of this character. For many years we had an adequate merchant marine that carried from 80 to 90 percent of our foreign commerce. Unfortunate legislation on this subject, above referred to, has almost destroyed our merchant marine.

The Democratic Party in 1932 had this to say on subsidies:

Revoke improvident subsidies granted to favorite interests.

Certainly under the record made and in the light of our past experiences, under present conditions and in keeping with our pledge to the people, we should not further consider this kind of legislation other than to repeal all existing laws dealing with this subject at this time.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Speaker, under the general permission granted Members of the House to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, I desire to say a few words in regard to the condition that has existed at the port of San Diego, Calif., for a number of years. Owing to the parliamentary situation existing during the consideration of the bill on the floor of the House, I would not have been able to make any statement whatever had it not been for the kindness of the able and distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries [Mr. BLAND], in charge of the bill, who most graciously granted me 3 minutes of his own limited time to speak upon the amendment offered by my colleague from California [Mr. BUCK].

In view of the fact that the said amendment is practically the same as one which I presented to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries during their hearings preceding the said bill, H. R. 8555, I will quote it here. It was offered as a proviso to section 1107 of the bill, under the title "Conferences", and reads as follows:

On page 67, line 15, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following language:

"Provided, That no such contract carrier shall enter into any conference agreement, belong to or become a part of any conference or association relieved of the antitrust acts which either through official acts or policies prevents or attempts to prevent, either directly or indirectly, the serving of any port within the continental limits of the United States located on any improvement project designed for the accommodation of ocean-going vessels authorized by the Congress or through it by any other agency of the Federal Government."

Having been chosen by the good people of the Twentieth District of California, comprising the counties of San Diego and Imperial, to represent their interests in the Congress of the United States, I have felt it a duty and a pleasure to work continually to build up that section. San Diego, favored with one of the finest harbors in the country, is the natural outlet for the products of the Southwest and northern Mexico. A growing shipping business was flourishing there until the Trans-Pacific Conference, known as the "Pacific Westbound Conference" and the "Pacific-European Conference", practically wiped the port out of existence as a shipping center. I touched upon this briefly in the few minutes I had on the floor, and would now like to explain to the House more fully what has been done to us at San Diego.

I wish to quote an article recently appearing in San Diego's leading morning newspaper, the San Diego Union, reading as follows:

CONFERENCE ACTS TO RESTRICT SHIP TRADE OF HARBOR

Once more a conference of steamship operators has lowered the boom on San Diego.

Steamship row was agog yesterday over the latest action against local trade, the effect of which is to transfer from San Diego to San Pedro a promising trade just getting on its feet—the direct shipment of local commodities to the United Kingdom.

The Pacific-European Conference, most of whose members are alien-flag lines, has ruled that ships may no longer call at San Diego to lift European cargo unless there is sufficient cargo to produce a revenue of $1,500 for each ship. The effect is to shut off the recently developed trade in fruit juices and extracts from this port to London which has been bringing at least one ship a month into San Diego, providing a neat addition to port revenues and to the income of local stevedores. As there never has been such a shipment coming up to $1,500 in revenue, and there is little likelihood of the possibility of concentrating enough cargo to reach that figure, it virtually shuts out this form of foreign trade, and forces its diversion by truck to San Pedro.

BATTLE ON NEW FRONT

The question of discriminating against San Diego by steamship conferences has been one of long standing. Ships bound to the Orient may call here to lift two commodities—scrap iron and bulk gypsum. If they lift any other cargo while in port here they must add a penalty of $2.50 a ton—described as an arbitrary—or move the cargo to San Pedro and load it there. This particular one is the subject of a protest by the city which still is before the Federal authorities.

Meanwhile, the harbor traffic department has other worries on its hands. After several years of work it succeeded in getting into the laws pertaining to certain trades the proviso that no conference could stop one of its member lines from calling to lift cargo, at terminal rates, from any port on which public funds had been expended. Now comes the Eastman bill to regulate steamship and other facilities, which entirely eliminates this protection. However, Representative GEORGE BURNHAM is reported as working on an amendment which would bar any line receiving a subsidy from membership in any conference which sought to keep its member lines out of any port which had been developed at public expense.

Reference in the above-quoted article to my working on an amendment which would bar any line receiving a subsidy from membership in any conference which sought to keep its member lines out of any port which has been developed at public expense is apparently in respect to the suggested amendment which I had sent to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries with my letter of April 1. This action was taken by me in the belief that, owing to the President's message of March 4, 1935—H. Doc. No. 118—dealing with the merchant marine and ship subsidies, action on earlier bills providing for the regulations of the transportation of passengers and property by water carriers, growing out of the recommendations of the administration through the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, Hon. Joseph B. Eastman—H. R. 5379 and S. 1632—would be deferred until the matters of the merchant marine were disposed of.

There are now pending in the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries two bills introduced by me on January 23, 1935—H. R. 4525 and H. R. 4526—either of which, if adopted, would have corrected the condition existing at San Diego. As one of these bills (H. R. 4525) may have discriminated against some inland ports, I decided to only ask consideration of the bill H. R. 4526. Knowing that the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce was holding hearings on their water-carrier bill—S. 1632—I requested Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, chairman of said committee, in letter dated March 19, 1935, to incorporate in the bill S. 1632 the substance of my bill H. R. 4526 as an amendment to be inserted following section 223 (d), on page 55, line 4, after the word "order", as follows:

Provided, That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water, either directly or indirectly through the medium of an agreement, conference, association, understanding, or otherwise, to prevent or attempt to prevent any other such carrier from extending service to any port located on any improvement project authorized by Congress, at the same rates which it charges at its nearest regular port of call, provided that said improvement project and said nearest port of call shall both lie within one of the following coastal areas of the United States, to wit: The Pacific coast from the Canadian border to the Mexican border; the Gulf coast from the Mexican border to and including Key West; the Atlantic coast from Key West (exclusive) to Cape Hatteras; the Atlantic coast from Cape Hatteras to the Canadian border.

At that time the House water-carrier bill was in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In view of the nature of the proposed legislation now being considered, the amendment offered by my colleague from California [Mr. BUCK], quoted in the early part of my remarks, may be more appropriate than my amendment, quoted immediately above. However, it is vital to the future of San Diego and the surrounding territory that relief be given.

In the remarks of the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries [Mr. BLAND] in reference thereto, he mentioned that he believed that the Shipping Act of 1916 "provides a remedy in hearings before the Board"—the Shipping Board. I should like to mention in this connection that a complaint was filed by the Harbor Commission of the city of San Diego et al. against the American Mail Line, Ltd., et al., on the 21st day of June 1933, and docketed as no. 106, in an effort to have the arbitrary of $2.50 per ton charged shippers at the port of San Diego lifted. This has been the subject of negotiations since August 1927. No formal brief was submitted by the Harbor Commission of San Diego until June 1934, the question being considered under United States Shipping Board Informal Complaint No. 687.

Under the informal handling by the Board, the Pacific Westbound Conference withdrew their policy of prohibiting the members of the said conference to call their ships at the port of San Diego, but simultaneously the conference ruled that the coastwise rates applying from San Diego to Los Angeles Harbor would be assessed in addition to tariff—terminal—rates. In addition thereto, the conference had agreed at a prior meeting to assess an arbitrary of $2.50 per ton, as freighted, on all cargo from San Diego, whether loaded at San Diego or carried by coastwise steamers to Los Angeles Harbor for transshipment to oriental ports. However, I will not now go into these details, but would mention that in addition to the complaint so filed the port of San Diego attempted to obtain relief in the Seventy-second and in each succeeding Congress.

A hearing was held in the above-mentioned case by the Shipping Board in September 1933. Since that time the steamship lines involved in this trade have found grounds from month to month to cause the Shipping Board Bureau to postpone each time the limit date for filing of steamship lines' brief. Their brief was due in May of this year. Even if then filed, the port of San Diego must file an answer to said brief before the matter could be handled by the examiner who held the hearings at San Diego. It will probably take several months for him to render his recommendations following which counsel on both sides will file objections if the examiner's recommendation is not in accord with their respective contentions. Each side then has the privilege of answering the other's objections brief. Then the matter is up to the Shipping Board Bureau for final decision. It will, therefore, be at least another year before a decision is reached in the trans-Pacific arbitrary case.

In the meantime, the port of San Diego will be deprived of the opportunity of participating in the shipping business which it has worked so hard to develop, notwithstanding the fact that San Diego has one of the finest natural harbors in the United States and its port facilities are most extensive and modern. The Federal Government expenditures on San Diego harbor approximate $4,000,000 to date, and the community expenditures $6,000,000, with a 5-year plan of the San Diego Harbor Commission calling for the expenditure of approximately $1,000,000 for general improvements, including piers, bulkheads, etc., all of which will be nullified to a large degree by rates, rules, regulations, and practices of steamship conferences, associations, combines, and agreements.

It is a deplorable situation where one arm of the Federal Government is responsible for the expenditure of large sums for harbor and waterway improvements and another arm of the Federal Government is either without authority and power to or will not initiate action to prevent private shipping interests, through conferences or otherwise, to nullify the full value of the expenditures made through the arm of the Federal Government first mentioned above.

Let me here quote from title I of bill H. R. 8555—Declaration of Policy—as follows:

SECTION 1. It is necessary for the national defense and development of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine (a) sufficient to carry its domestic water-borne commerce and at least one-half of the water-borne export and import foreign commerce of the United States and to provide shipping service on all routes essential for maintaining the flow of such domestic and foreign water-borne commerce at all times, (b) capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, (c) owned and operated under the United States flag by citizens of the United States and so regulated by the Government as to secure to the shipper and receiver of products in the domestic and foreign water-borne commerce of the United States adequate service and equitable rates. * * *

This is just what we are asking for the port of San Diego—"to secure to the shipper and receiver of products in the domestic and foreign water-borne commerce of the United States adequate service and equitable rates." Under the present conference discriminations the port of San Diego and the fertile territory for which the port is the natural outlet is deprived of the shipping business of hundreds of shippers of agriculture of all kinds, including fruits, fruit juices and extracts, cotton, vegetables, olives, and nuts, canned fish, and many other valuable products. This will continue until this conference restraint of trade is broken up. Some of the largest canners in and around San Diego say they must close their plants if this situation is not corrected, resulting in tremendous loss to our city and surrounding territory.

Most of the steamship conferences are composed of foreign-flag lines. Not that American-flag lines do not approve of conferences, but there are more foreign-flag lines operating to and from our ports in the foreign trade. All foreign-flag lines do not belong to conferences, but the existing conferences exert sufficient power to influence nonconference operators, whether American or foreign flag. We have a very recent case of the Pacific coast-European conference, composed entirely of foreign-flag lines, 17 or 18 lines, exerting this influence upon the only American-flag line, nonconference, in the Pacific-European trade. This line, the Isthmian Line, has been calling at the port of San Diego for some time—irregularly in the beginning, but with a great deal of regularity in the past year—lifting grapefruit juice manufactured in San Diego County, destined to London, and miscellaneous cargo.

Regularity of calls was just beginning to be such that cotton shippers in the interior could depend upon it when the Pacific Coast-European Conference of 17 or 18 ship lines put through a rule that no vessel would be permitted to call at the port of San Diego for less than $1,500 revenue per call. While the Isthmian Line is not a member of the conference, the conference exerts sufficient influence to cause the Isthmian Line to abide by its rules. An Isthmian Line representative sits in the conference meetings, but has no vote. However, the rules and regulations laid down by the conference are followed by the Isthmian Line. It is apparent that the Isthmian Line must abide by the rules and regulations of the conference to avoid gang throat-cutting by conference lines.

Another recent incident is the promulgation of an arbitrary of $1 per ton and a 500-ton minimum against the port of San Diego over Los Angeles Harbor by the Argentine-Brazil-River Platte Conference. It is my understanding this conference is comprised in the majority of foreign lines. This action came swiftly following efforts of San Diego to develop a movement of Argentine corn through that port, followed by efforts to induce one of the lines in the trade to call their vessels direct with the tonnage. The conference apparently realized that whatever lines succumbed to the pleas of San Diego to call their vessels direct would have an advantage for that particular business over the lines that did not desire to call direct. Consequently, the conference set out to prevent this happening and did, for it is obvious that the shipping of the port of San Diego cannot be increased in the face of arbitraries and the many other prohibitions.

As stated above, these conferences are composed in the majority of foreign steamship lines. Several American lines are members of the conference and receive subsidies from the Government now in the form of mail contracts. Other American-flag lines in the conference have received construction loans, and so forth. If they were prohibited in the manner I have suggested in any shipping-subsidy legislation, they could not belong to this foreign-controlled conference, else it would have to be a part of the preamble of the conference not to interfere or attempt to interfere with any line desiring to serve any ports. We only ask for equality of rates with other ports and that conference restrictions be not placed upon the port of San Diego and the communities served thereby.

I should like to elaborate to some extent, with the possibility of an occasional repetition, the present situation as it affects the port of San Diego. The provisions of my bill, H. R. 4526, referred to above, are, in part, now a law as to intercoastal steamship lines through the Panama Canal. Experience has proved their value in connection with the intercoastal operators, and it has been found that the proposed law is absolutely necessary for the port of San Diego and ports similarly situated as protection from discriminatory practices by lines plying between foreign ports and the United States and its possessions and by lines plying in the coastwise trade.

Combinations in restraint of trade are illegal in all lines of business except ocean shipping as permitted by the Shipping Act of 1916.

The Shipping Act recognizes combinations of steamship companies, permitting combines, conferences, or associations to initiate action either in service or rates, subject to approval by the United States Shipping Board Bureau; however, if such actions are considered discriminatory or otherwise unlawful and objectionable to certain ports and shippers, a long-drawn-out hearing and subsequent briefing of facts and arguments are necessary to correct the situation, notwithstanding the fact that a member line of such conference may desire to extend its service to additional ports at rates the same as it charges its nearest regular port of call. To date conferences have not permitted individual members the prerogative of following their desires in this regard.

The United States Shipping Board Bureau authority over foreign and coastwise rates (interstate) is limited only to maximum rates, which are required to be filed with the Board by the carriers, thereby enabling conferences to dictate to individual members rates at variance as between different ports.

The Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933, in which there is incorporated the provisions of H. R. 4526 in part, confers regulatory powers on the Shipping Board Bureau only as to intercoastal shipping through the Panama Canal, and does not remove the right of conferences, and so forth, to establish rates, rules, and practices in foreign and coastwise services in variance as between different ports.

The Shipping Act of 1916 does not require the establishment of service, leaving such action in the hands of combinations of shipping companies, or individual shipping companies when permitted by conferences, and so forth, thereby making it possible for combinations, conferences, and associations to prevent establishment, which they do, of service to ports additional to those already served at rates charged the nearest port of call to the added port.

The Federal Government, on recommendations of the War Department, Board of Army Engineers, are continually approving new harbor and waterway projects which are, for the most part, justified by a result in saving in transportation cost, relieving congestion, and providing additional national defense. However, the Shipping Act, as amended to date, is an instrument tending to nullify the full value of Federal expenditures on new port and waterway projects through absence of prohibition of combinations, conferences, and so forth, to prevent members of such agreements, combines, associations, and conferences from using the new facilities at rates permitting their use as contemplated by the War Department, Board of Army Engineers, when the projects were recommended.

Unquestionably it is wrong for the Federal Government to expend the taxpayers' money on harbor and waterway improvements, and at the same time permit private steamship companies through agreements, combines, conferences, or associations to nullify the full value of these expenditures.

For the purpose of serving certain areas better than are, or may be, served by existing facilities, are new harbor and waterway projects recommended by the Board of Army Engineers and authorized by Congress, thereby assisting in the development and prosperity of the area concerned. However, this purpose may be, and is, defeated, and development and prosperity greatly retarded through the combination of private interests which are unsound and not in the public interest.

The Shipping Act of 1916 should be amended, making illegal these practices permitted by law and actually done by groups of shipping interests, thereby allowing any member of combines, conferences, associations, and so forth, who so desires, to extend to any terminal or port at rates which it charges for service to its nearest regular port of call.

Present practices and policies of conferences preventing individual members from extending service to additional ports and charging rates the same as charged their nearest regular port of call retards the development of certain ports of this country, and such business as can withstand the practice and policy of the conferences, causing higher transportation cost, is forced through competing ports and from the port to which it naturally belongs and should move through.

The port of San Diego, Calif., experiences at the present time a case in point—that of the Pacific Westbound Conference prohibiting member lines calling ships at the port to lift cotton and general cargo at terminal rates or rates which are the same as in effect at Los Angeles Harbor, with the exception of gypsum and scrap iron for oriental ports. The Trans-Pacific Line calling at the port at present to lift gypsum and scrap iron is a member of that conference and desires to lift cotton and other general cargo at the rates applied at its nearest regular port of call, Los Angeles Harbor; but the conference has prohibited this and requires that tonnage lifted at the port of San Diego, with the exception of these two commodities, be assessed an arbirary of $2.50 per ton over and above terminal rates, which are the rates charged at the nearest regular port of call of the line, notwithstanding the fact that vessels may be in port loading one or the other or both of these commodities, and the cotton and general cargo could be taken by said vessels. In addition, handling charges averaging 60 cents per ton are exacted, which are double like charges at the nearest regular port of call of the line, or are not exacted at all at said port or other ports of call of the line's vessels.

This conflict or lack of coordination in the merchant-marine policy affecting the development of United States ports and waterways is not in the public interest or the interest of the merchant marine and should be promptly rectified. Nearly a million dollars has been expended by the Federal Government in the past few years in deepening and widening the San Diego Harbor entrance channel, and $1,800,000 additional has been allocated, the value of which is at least partially nullified by the action of the Pacific Westbound Conference.

The Congress recognized the policy of providing for equalization of rates to new or additional ports with rates applying at the nearest port of call in passing the Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933, applying to the intercoastal trade through the Panama Canal, by withholding from the Shipping Board Bureau the right to prevent equal rates, which act also prevents combinations of private interests from preventing members to accord equal rates, leaving the individual members free to do as they wish, but the law does not apply to foreign and coastwise operators. The proposed amendment is designed to correct this evil and lack of regulation.

At the committee hearing on the Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933 an amendment was requested recognizing the soundness of allowing no one to prevent steamers from going to additional ports at the rates they charge at their nearest regular port of call, and amendment was made in view of the fact when the amendment was presented, representatives of shipping companies (who strongly urged passage of the intercoastal bill) were asked whether they saw any objection to the amendment, and it is understood their replies were they did not see any objection, and others not asked interposed no objection; consequently, it is felt they would not now oppose the proposed amendment, which simply makes effective the amendment already incorporated in the Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933, applicable to foreign and coastwise lines.

Problems of the port of San Diego, in addition to the trans-Pacific arbitrary, already outlined, which the proposed amendment will solve, include—

A. The Pacific Coastwise Conference, covering the carriers in the Pacific coastwise trade, prevents member lines according San Diego the same rates as Los Angeles Harbor, or a more equitable relationship of rates, notwithstanding certain members of the conference desire to do so. Such practices are not permitted in the Interstate Commerce Act applying to the rail carriers, each carrier being free to do as he likes and prohibited from interfering with another only through complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

B. Handling charges exacted by steamship lines calling at the port of San Diego, through the guise of the San Diego Steamship Association, which is unknown, the lines calling in reality being dictated to by the Los Angeles Steamship Association, to which they and many others not calling at San Diego are members, are double like charges at Los Angeles Harbor. No handling charges at all are exacted at San Francisco. The port of San Diego is endeavoring to handle inland tonnage tributary to the port and has found it very difficult—in fact, practically impossible—due to the steamship lines calling at San Diego also calling at the port of Los Angeles, which is able to serve practically the same tributary territory cheaper than the port of San Diego, due to the handling charge there being one-half of the amount exacted at San Diego.

The amendments mentioned are not meant to, and will not force any steamship company to extend service. They simply make it possible for any steamship company to extend service and apply rates for such service according to the desires of the particular steamship company without interference from any other steamship company, either directly or indirectly. As stated before there are a number of steamship lines that would gladly serve the port of San Diego as to any shipment they might receive.

In conclusion, I wish to quote a resolution unanimously adopted by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, heretofore, mentioned by me, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution No. 16 relative to Federal legislation granting subsidy or assistance to the American merchant marine

Whereas it is deemed desirous by the Government of the United States to give consideration to the development of the American merchant marine through assistance by the Government in the matter of sale of vessels constructed by the Government, in the matter of subsidies, mail contracts, or otherwise; and

Whereas steamships operating over the various trade routes of the world are grouped into conferences or associations granting to the shipping industry a certain amount of self-government and coordination in the matter of rates and services; and

Whereas under Federal laws enacted by the Congress these conferences or groups are relieved of the Sherman Act preventing combinations in the restraint of trade; and

Whereas these conferences, in the majority of cases, having a preponderance of foreign ownership through their policies and rules, have seen fit to prevent their members from serving certain American ports; and

Whereas it is believed to be a sound policy for the Government of the United States to require that all vessels receiving assistance from it through the medium of subsidy, ship purchase, or otherwise should partake in a free and unrestricted flow of traffic through all ports of the United States which have been improved by the use of Federal funds: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of California, That the Congress of the United States, in connection with any legislation granting subsidy or assistance to the American merchant marine, be requested to incorporate therein the provision that no steamship line operating vessels belonging to the United States or purchased or being purchased from the United States or any agency thereof, or any steamship company receiving from the United States or any agency thereof any subsidy or payment through contract for the carrying of mails, or otherwise, shall belong to any conference or association relieved of the Sherman Act which, either through official acts or policies, prevents or attempts to prevent, either directly or indirectly, the serving of any port within the continental limits of the United States located on any improvement project designed for the accommodation of ocean-going vessels authorized by the Congress or through it by any other agency of the Federal Government; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this joint resolution be transmitted to the President and to the Vice President of the United States and to each Member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. CONNERY, Mr. Speaker, following my remarks made during the consideration of the ship-subsidy bill I received a very fine letter from the officers of the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steam Fitters of the United States, which organization is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and which letter I will insert at this point in my remarks:

UNITED ASSOCIATION OF JOURNEYMEN PLUMBERS AND STEAM FITTERS OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.,
House of Representatives, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We note in your remarks during the considerations of the ship-subsidy bill that you called the attention of the Members of Congress to the need of having automatic sprinkler installations on all passenger-carrying ships.

We trust you will give your hearty support to H. R. 6363, as presented by your colleague, Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK, and Senate 2127, as presented by Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND. These bills are sponsored by this organization and are whole-heartedly supported by the American Federation of Labor.

The bills referred to provide for the installation of automatic sprinklers on passenger-carrying ships, as you are well aware, and with the horror of recent ship disasters still haunting our memories, this creates within us added stimulus for installation of unquestioned and thoroughly proven fire-destroying appliances, as represented by automatic sprinklers in sea-going vessels, where human life pays the penalty for the omission of this proven safeguard.

For approximately 55 years automatic sprinklers have proven their efficiency in conquering fire on land or sea, and perhaps the most ardent advocates of automatic sprinklers are the fire chiefs and fire fighters everywhere, who recognize in a sprinkler acting automatically, a fireman on duty through all the hours of the day and night.

There is no disputation as to its efficiency. It can be again repeated that in all fire history of our land, not one human life has been lost in any structure where automatic sprinklers were installed during all the years of its existence.

Automatic sprinkler efficiency in land fire protection can and should be duplicated in protection against fire at sea. We honestly believe that had an automatic sprinkler system been installed on the Morro Castle not one life would have been sacrificed and there would have been no property loss.

Incidentally the cost of this installation in dollars is remarkably low, although, of course, this should not be considered when human life is the price to be paid for failure to safeguard.

Then, again, there comes the question of labor employment relative to this subject. One can trace reemployment features of automatic sprinkler installations back to the man who mines the ore, the transport workers, the steel workers, and, lastly, the skilled mechanic who installs the finished product, members of our international union. And so you see there is protection in these referred-to bills for the seagoing public and much-needed employment for our workers.

In closing, let it not be said that saving life and property against fire dangers at sea presents more difficult and less favorable opportunity than is presented in land conflagrations. Automatic sprinklers will control fire with equal efficiency on land or sea. There is no fire hazard aboard ship, no problem of engineering, no hidden space where fire lurks that has not been completely mastered by automatic sprinklers in land fire experiences.

We urge your hearty cooperation to the end that the purport and intentions contained in these bills herein referred to shall be written into law, and you and we shall then know that a most important and sadly needed step in the direction of safety at sea will have been taken.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN COLFIELD.
THOS. E. BURKE.

Attest:

THOS. E. BURKE,
General Secretary-Treasurer.

It is surprising, in view of the recent disasters at sea, to find that the officers of the Department of Commerce are still hesitating before they issue regulations which will require all passenger-carrying ships to install as a safety device that system which has been and is recognized by every agency devoted to safety of life from fire as the most dependable in case of fire, namely, the automatic sprinklers.

There is hardly a large building in our country, there are no large buildings that I know of devoted to industrial production, where many workers are employed, but where you will find the automatic sprinkler system installed.

This being true, surely there is greater reason why such a system should be installed on our passenger-carrying vessels where the passengers have no possible chance for their lives in case of fire except for such agencies aboard ships as the ship may have. When a fire breaks out in a building there is always the chance of the fire department coming to one's rescue. At sea there is no one within reach of the vessel.

In the cities of Lynn, Lawrence, Peabody, Salem, and Revere, communities in my own district, where large buildings are devoted to industrial production, where the buildings themselves are of first-class construction and thus labeled fireproof, you will find as a safety device the automatic sprinkler system installed.

It is amazing to me and to everyone else who has given this matter much thought to learn that the Bureau of Navigation still allows passenger-carrying vessels to leave shore without having automatic-sprinkler systems installed and in operation on all such vessels.

Especially is this true when only a few months ago the Nation was horrified to find that hundreds of lives were lost aboard the Morro Castle as a result of a fire which had started without the knowledge of the passengers or the officers or crew of the vessel.

Had the Morro Castle been equipped with automatic sprinklers, the fire would have been extinguished before it made headway and the live of hundreds of American citizens would have been saved.

Automatic sprinklers are looked upon universally as silent watchmen, ever on the alert, on duty 24 hours each day, and, when installed by competent and qualified workmen, are a guaranty of the safety of the lives of those in such buildings or vessels where such automatic sprinklers are in operation.

In view of the apparent hesitancy of the officers of the Department of Commerce—those who are intrusted with the enforcement of our navigation laws and those who inspect our ships—it is my belief that Congress should enact legislation at this session directing that no passenger-carrying vessel be allowed to leave shore unless such vessel can show that it carries an automatic sprinkler system which is in proper working order.

I note from the letter sent to me by the officers of the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steam Fitters that our colleague and my good friend, Congressman RAMSPECK, of Georgia, has presented H. R. 6363, which legislation directs the Bureau of Navigation to order the installation of an automatic-sprinkler system on all passenger vessels. I sincerely trust that this measure will be enacted at this session of Congress. Surely there is no opposition to such a measure. There is great need for it in view of what we all know. The hesitancy of those in charge of originating such a regulation under existing laws prior to this time warrants the Congress in no longer leaving this matter to anyone. There is but one way in which we can all be assured that those who travel aboard ship can be assured of protection from fire, and that is for Congress to make mandatory the installation of automatic-sprinkler systems aboard all passenger-carrying ships.

I believe that the committee in charge of this bill will be rendering a great service to every Member of the House and to all of the American people by speedily reporting favorably this measure.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks on ship subsidies, I wish to enter the following statements:

Governmental subsidization of activities, which are considered to be of vital importance to the welfare of the Nation, are by no means innovations. The idea of national interest makes it essential for a government to aid those activities which increase general economic welfare or national defense. When the President of the United States sent us his ship-subsidy measure, and when our distinguished committee prepared itself to draw up a bill to improve our merchant marine, they were actuated by the loftiest motives.

I wish to make it clear that I am no foe of the development of our merchant marine or of providing an adequate national defense, but I am absolutely opposed to this bill H. R. 8555. My opposition can be briefly stated as follows: First, this bill is not along the lines of the President's message. Second, this bill is not a ship subsidy, but a shippers subsidy. Third, this bill does not eliminate the graft, corruption, and inefficiency of the past. Fourth, this bill takes no consideration of the lengthy and detailed hearings of the Black Senate committee, and by this failure it does not embody principles recommended by that investigation which will provide us with an adequate merchant marine.

In attempting to deal with ship subsidies, there are three courses that may be followed:

First. Government ownership and Government operation.

Second. Government ownership and private operation.

Third. Subsidized private ownership and private operation.

The Black committee, after completing its hearings, stated these three possibilities and recommended them in that order. Here we have before us a bill which, if enacted, will carry out the least desirable of these three plans.

I have outlined the courses which can be followed. Now, let us see what are the present needs along this line. It has been contended, and will continue to be contended until some definite and workable policy is adopted, that the development of a merchant marine can only be developed with the aid and assistance of our Government. The President in his message summed up this need in words that are clear and decisive. He said:

I present to the Congress the question of whether or not the United States should have an adequate merchant marine.

To me there are three reasons for answering this question in the affirmative. The first is that in time of peace subsidies granted by other nations, shipping combines, and other restrictive or rebating methods may well be used to the detriment of American shippers. The maintenance of fair competition alone calls for American-flag ships of sufficient tonnage to carry a reasonable portion of our foreign commerce.

Second. In the event of a major war in which the United States is not involved, our commerce, in the absence of an adequate American merchant marine, might find itself seriously crippled because of its inability to secure bottoms for neutral peaceful foreign trade.

Third. In the event of a war in which the United States itself might be engaged, American-flag ships are obviously needed, not only for naval auxiliaries but also for the maintenance of a reasonable and necessary commercial intercourse with other nations. We should remember lessons learned in the last war.

In those few words the needs of an adequate merchant marine have been clearly set forth.

This present bill falls far short of being adequate in the terms of the Presidential message. It is a shippers' subsidy, and not a ship subsidy. Since the moment the rule on this bill was called up, there has been a constant attempt to throw the mantle of Presidential or administration support over the measure. Repeatedly statements have been made that this is a Presidential or administration bill. In only a few instances the supporters of this measure have clearly and honestly denied that this is an administration bill. It is self-evident that the measure is not a Presidential bill. The chief common factor between the President's message and the present bill is the announced statement of purpose; that is, the development of the merchant marine, promotion of commerce, and aid in national defense.

From the days of the Yankee clipper ships, when American ships ruled supreme on the waves, there has been a steady decline in our merchant marine. By 1910 American ships were carrying less than 9 percent of this Nation's foreign cargoes. The World War showed our deficiencies in the line of an adequate merchant marine. In 1916 the United States Shipping Board was established, and since that time billions of dollars have been spent by the Shipping Board to aid in the development of the merchant marine. No one denies these expenditures of the Shipping Board in this first attempt to encourage our merchant marine. In spite of all this the merchant marine gradually declined, and in 1928, when we were riding on the crest of economic conditions and when there was a yearly surplus in our Treasury, the Congress of the United States passed the Merchant Marine Act of 1928. It was then that a powerful shipping lobby carried its plant to subsidize American shipbuilders and operators—a proposal that had repeatedly failed prior to 1928.

The experiences of the World War made us firmly believe that we needed a merchant marine. At the end of the war we had about 2,000 vessels afloat and under construction. These vessels had cost us $3,000,000,000. Since that time the Government has sold nearly all of these vessels to private owners. Of these vessels, 220 are now engaged in mail-contract service. These 220 vessels cost the United States Government $516,174,249.28, and they were sold to these private operators for $41,411,665.10. It is true that the vessels had depreciated in value, but they had been carefully kept up at Government expense, and as the yearly depreciation went on their value had been marked down. They were actually sold at $25,561,229.90 less than their marked-down value. At the present time the Government still owns 45 boats which are being operated by private concerns for private profit.

We have tried to develop our merchant marine through Government aid to these ship-building and ship-operating companies. Now the poor shipping interests tell us they cannot compete with foreign merchant marines and they want more help. Under the provisions of the present bill the big shipping interests can continue their looting of the Public Treasury, as they have done in the past. Much could be overlooked if in the past the merchant marine had been developed as Congress had planned. The old agreements for private operation benefited shipping interests, but not our merchant marine. Today we are asked to extend further benefits without adequate guarantee that the much desired development of our merchant marine will be effected.

Let me give a few examples of these private operating agreements. In 1921 the Shipping Board established the Admiral Oriental Mail Line, which was operated by the Dollar interests. The line was organized in 1922 with a cash capital of $500 and notes given for capital stock amounting to $499,500. For nearly 3½ years the Dollar people operated this line on a managing-operator basis. They directly profited by $533,713.96 and indirectly profited by an additional $463,682.01. In these 3½ years they retired the notes given for capital stock, thus leaving an investment of $500. Since that time, without one dollar's investment, the Dollar interests purchased the line and certain ships and have earned net profits of $4,106,594.46 plus a mail subsidy and plus $2,127,653.30 other profits on this $500 investment. By this entire manipulation profits of $6,700,000 have been made on a $500 investment.

The Roosevelt Steamship Co. (named after Kermit Roosevelt) realized profits of $371,987.96 from 1931 to 1933, inclusive, on an outstanding capital of $22,000. Probably the most conspicuous case is that of the International Mercantile Marine-Roosevelt Steamship Co. This group took over the United States Lines. The I. M. C. operated 71 vessels, of which 60 were under foreign registry. A protest was raised when the I. M. C. tried to take over the United States Lines due to the fact that the I. M. C. had such great foreign interests and because it had bound itself to operate in harmony with British imperial interests. To get around this, the I. M. C. joined the Roosevelt and Dollar interests to form a syndicate, taking over the United States Lines. They received, among other vessels, the pride of America, the steamship Leviathan. In this deal we turned over vessels costing $44,000,000 for $3,175,000. In addition to all of this, the Shipping Board made loans amounting to more than $15,000,000 for 20 years at one-half of 1 percent interest. The Post Office Department then let two mail contracts for a 10-year period, which will amount to $24,000,000.

Surely these few illustrations show the folly of such operations by our Government. The folly and extravagance are clearly seen when we view the present sad state of our merchant marine and the pleas of these very shipping interests for increased governmental aid. Now all of these managing-operator agreements are only one side of the picture. Let us consider the operation of the Merchant Marine Act of 1928. This act did not pay the outright subsidies that many European countries were paying. All payments of subsidies took two forms: (1) Subsidies paid by the Post Office Department on mail contracts, and (2) low-rate interest loans for ship construction. To get a complete picture of the way in which this plan has worked out let me cite some of the actual practices under that act.

The subsidies that were granted in the form of mail contracts have been criticized as being awarded to favored companies and in many cases for payments far in excess of reasonable business practice. It is not my intention to assail those practices, as we are now discussing a new bill which it is hoped will correct those conditions. I cite the following facts merely to show that these poor shipbuilders and shipowners have not been so badly treated as their high-powered lobbyists would lead one to believe. At this time I wish to point out that under the act of 1928 these shipping interests were unable to operate in such a manner as to enable them to materially build up our merchant marine. If such is the case, then how can they do this under the bill now before us?

The United Fruit Co. in 1931 received $726,146 for carrying United States mail. One contract to this company provided for a payment of $392,860, where under the international postal rates this mail would have been carried for $3,248. In 1931 this company operated 77 vessels, 55 of which were operated under the flag of a foreign nation. Surely the United Fruit Co. must have considered itself well cared for by this country during 1931—the dark year of the economic depression.

The South Atlantic Steamship Co., operating between Bremen, Germany, and Savannah, received $917,169 for carrying $75 worth of mail. On one line between French Indo-China and San Francisco the Government paid to the Oceanic & Oriental Navigation Co. $300,000 for carrying $2,655 worth of mail. The Eastern Steamship Lines received $648,432 for carrying mail worth $9,246. The Export Steamship Co. was paid $3,800,000 for carrying $89,000 worth of mail. The Tampa Inter-Ocean Steamship Co. received a subsidy of $438,775 for carrying mail which under international postage rates could have been carried for $20. The Grace Steamship Co. was paid $2,676,706 for mail rated at $374,634.

The Munson Lines, which in 1931 operated 98 vessels, had only 31 of these under American flags. Yet, from August 1, 1928, to June 30, 1932, this line received from mail contracts $3,679,132 for mail rated at $279,718. The Dollar Steamship Co. received $6,674,714 for mail rated at $533,418.

Our great President, earnestly desiring to bring about the promotion of our merchant marine, gave us his recommendations. He specifically recommended that the construction loans be abolished and that regulatory powers be transferred into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This bill does neither of these things. Gentlemen, we need not pass a bill because "it is the best we can get at this time." Let us go after and get the best. If Government ownership and operation or Government ownership and private operation are to be considered out of the picture, there is still one course we can follow. We can, and we should, ask the great shipping interests to put their houses in order before they reach out their hands for further help from the Public Treasury. If we must subsidize private ownership and operation, have we not the right to demand that those companies we subsidize be placed in a position where there is a guaranty of future development of our merchant marine and less profit to a few manipulators of Government money? The people of the United States want an adequate merchant marine, but they want one developed in an honest and patriotic manner.

CONSTITUTIONAL OR DICTATORIAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made over the radio last night by our colleague from New York, Mr. FISH.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech of Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Tuesday, June 25, 1935.

The main issues for the 1936 Presidential campaign are rapidly taking shape. It is certain that the restoration of American constitutional government and a government by law instead of by Executive orders will be debated and discussed from now on throughout the Nation.

In the final analysis the American people must decide whether they want to uphold and preserve our constitutional and representative form of government, based on three separate and independent branches, or to follow the footsteps of Fascism, Nazilism, or communism, and undermine and encroach upon the Congress and the Supreme Court in order to give autocratic and dictatorial powers to the President.

I do not question the right of the American people to alter or to abolish our form of government in accordance with the Declaration of Independence, but at the same time we should remember the advice contained in the Declaration that "prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes."

There have been a number of splendid speeches recently delivered as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court against the delegation of legislative powers. In view of this fact, I intend to digress somewhat from the purely constitutional aspects of the issue and to emphasize the efforts that have been made by the "new dealers" to set up a new social and economic order through usurped dictatorial powers, in defiance of the Constitution, which have resulted in the loss of business confidence and a prolongation of the depression. There can be no doubt but that the main purpose of the "new dealers" is to establish State socialism on a permanent basis, which cannot be carried out as long as the Constitution stands in their way as a bulwark and palladium for American liberties and free institutions.

The surrender of the tariff-making powers, the regulation and valuation of money, and the control of the purse strings to the President by a servile and cowardly partisan Congress amounts to a change in our form of government without the consent of the governed.

The turning over by the Congress to the President, upon his insistent and arrogant demands, of $4,000,000,000 for public works has been attacked on the grounds of being a slush fund to be used for political and campaign purposes. This unprecedented peace-time appropriation carried no allocation of the money for specific purposes, no limitations of any kind, and is a direct violation of the meaning and intent of the Constitution.

Senator COUZENS said that the man or men responsible for the original bill to turn the control of the purse strings over to the President should be hanged. That is a little harsh, even for "new dealers", but I would suggest that if they do not like our free institutions and constitutional form of government that they should be deported to Italy, Germany, or Soviet Russia, where they can enjoy an autocratic and dictatorial form of government to their hearts' content.

And, referring to deportation, I am whole-heartedly in favor of the suggestion of Congressman DIES, of Texas, that all aliens, radicals, Communists, and others who do not like our institutions, our laws, or our country should be deported back home where they can enjoy the lack of freedom of speech and the oppressive laws and miserable wage scales that they have been accustomed to in the past, and, above all, give their jobs to loyal and industrious American citizens now walking the streets.

I do not believe, however, that Government appropriations, no matter how large, will seriously affect the result of the next Presidential campaign, although they do unquestionably help in municipal and off-year elections.

What the voters must decide in 1936 is which party will restore confidence and thereby provide permanent employment. Confidence and employment are one and inseparable, and constitute for millions of loyal and industrious Americans who are now walking the streets under the Roosevelt administration and more millions on the relief rolls an issue closer to home and more vital to their well being and that of their families than even the restoration of constitutional government. It is unfair and unjust to impugn the motives of Americans now on relief. They are good citizens, forced by the depression temporarily to depend on the Federal Government for relief, but what they really want and are entitled to is permanent jobs.

In my opinion the main ingredient that is lacking to make for prosperity in America is confidence, which has all but been destroyed by the unsound and socialistic new-deal experiments, generally in defiance of the Constitution. The American people, regardless of party affiliations, are thinking in terms of permanent jobs at the customary standards of wages and are far from satisfied with Government relief at 50 cents a day.

No administration has done more in the last 6 months, since Congress convened, than the "new dealers" to undermine confidence by open attacks on business interests, from the President down to the humblest member of the "brain trust." All seem to delight in taking a swat at business men as if they were obnoxious flies, to be crushed at every opportunity. Ours is a business country and there can be no prosperity or employment without business confidence. Our entire industrial system is based upon private initiative and reasonable profits, and unless there are profits there can be no decent wages or employment. From the recent actions of the new-deal administration one must assume that the main policy of the new-deal fly swatters is to destroy wealth, business enterprise, and opportunities for advancement and success.

It is beginning to be more and more plain that the "new dealers" have been actually seeking to set up a new social and economic order, without the consent or approval of the American people. The unanimous decision of the Supreme Court against the delegation of legislative powers to the President was a frightful blow to the aspirations and deep-laid plans of the radical "new dealers." But they have no intention of giving up without further attempts against our constitutional and representative form of government. Like a lot of termites, they can be depended upon to try to undermine our Constitution, in order to pull it down to destruction upon the heads of the American people and on our free institutions.

What does this new foreign political and economic order offer to the American people—which is being imposed upon them by the "new dealers", most of whom have never been affiliated with the Democratic Party in their lives, and are Socialists at heart and in action? The sacrifice of the rights and liberties of our people guaranteed by the Constitution and the blessings of free government by free sovereign American citizens, in exchange for a dictatorial, autocratic, despotic government, supported by a crushing bureaucracy, regimentation, collectivism, and State socialism. Under this imported form of government our people would become mere pawns at the caprice or whim of some dictator in the White House, entrenched under a huge bureaucracy and the funds out of the Treasury of the United States.

The people must decide whether they shall continue to be the masters of their political destinies or whether supreme power shall be vested in a single individual to rule over them. Mussolini, Hitler, and Stalin all join in declaring to the world that self-government and democratic institutions have failed, and that the American people are no longer competent to govern themselves. I deny these accusations, as the American people have the same intelligence, capacity, and patriotism as their forefathers, and can solve all their social, political, and economic problems without resorting to communism or socialism of the left or Fascism or Hitlerism of the right. They propose to solve them on sound American principals, for the best interest of all the American people, and that is the only way out of the depression to better and happier times.

What is needed in America today is confidence, more confidence, and still more confidence. We need inflation of confidence, not inflation of currency and destruction of wealth. We need a square deal for business and labor that will provide profits and employment, not a new deal that destroys both and retards recovery and impoverishes the people, or an old deal where selfish interests and special privilege were predominant.

I denounce the new-deal administration for trying to set up a new social and economic order, in defiance of the Constitution, and without the consent of the American people. I charge it with undermining our constitutional and representative form of government, usurping the powers of Congress and establishing a dictatorial government by executive orders. I accuse it of destroying business confidence, prolonging the depression, furthering unemployment, increasing the cost of living, and inciting class hatred. England, Canada, and Germany have all balanced their budgets, restored confidence and put their people back to work. Why is not the United States making similar progress? The answer is systematic and repeated attacks on American investors, employers of labor, business men, and upon all who have any money left, whether in the banks, securities, or in life insurance policies. There is no stability or security and everyone is apprehensive as to what money will be worth a year from now.

The President himself has led the attack on American investors and business men, so that the great national sport emanating from the White House has become "soak and swat the rich." It has all of a sudden become a crime to have money. The President forgets that since 1929 there has been the greatest distribution of wealth in the history of the world. The rich men have lost half to two-thirds of their fortunes through the depreciation of security values and real estate, and some former millionaires are penniless and walking the streets looking for jobs. If it were true that wealth were accumulated in the hands of a few and endangered our economic and political institutions, as might have been the case back in 1928–29, I could see some sound reason for the President's recent soak-the-rich speech; but that is not true today. Attacks on wealth in the midst of a depression only adds to the confusion and bewilderment of business and further destroys confidence. It amounts to killing the goose that lays the golden eggs, prevents the flow of surplus capital into private enterprise to keep the wheels of industry going and the employment of labor. It wipes out the liberal gifts of rich men for charitable purposes and for the erection of new hospitals, libraries, art museums, and the endowments of colleges and educational institutions. But, above and beyond all else, it destroys confidence when it is most needed. What is really necessary is distribution of jobs, and there can be no such distribution if wealth is confiscated. I do, however, agree with the President in urging the abolition of tax-exempt securities through which rich men and women have been able to escape paying their share of income taxes.

The insistence of the President to jam through the death sentence clause in the utility holding company bill is just another instance of the swat-business attitude, regardless of the savings of millions of American investors. The personal castigation of the chamber of commerce by the President as not being representative of business interests and viewpoint would be amusing if it were not so really tragic coming from the President who has repudiated not only the platform he was elected upon, but likewise the political creed of all Jeffersonian Democrats.

The President even went to the extent of denouncing American citizens for writing to their representatives in Congress petitioning them to use their influence to amend the original death clause in the proposed utility bill. Up to the advent of the new-deal administration the right of petition was regarded as a sacred institution, but evidently it, like other rights, must be surrendered if in conflict with the views of the autocrat in the White House.

Have the flames of liberty burned so low among free American citizens, regardless of previous party affiliation, that they will permit the continuation of the surrender and delegation of legislative powers by a partisan and supine Congress, sworn to uphold the Constitution, to a President who casts slurs upon it and refers to it as a "horse and buggy" Constitution?

In the critical days with which we are confronted the President would be rendering a far better service to the country to uphold and defend the Constitution rather than, in the words of Pope:

> "Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
> And without sneering teach the rest to sneer;
> Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
> Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike."

Would it not be beneficial in these uncertain and trying days to stand firmly for the Constitution, with Abraham Lincoln, who believed it to be all the law and the prophets, instead of against it; to preach the gospel of confidence in our American system instead of the gospel of expediency, experimentation, and despair? The issues of today are above the interests and advantages of party. They involve the preservation of our American constitutional and representative system of government and the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. There can be no compromise with those enemies from within who would undermine or destroy them.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

Thank you and good night.

THE GOVERNMENT SHOULD NOT BE A SUBSIDIARY OF THE HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a radio speech I made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I ask permission to include my remarks on the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, delivered over the National Broacasting Co., Tuesday, June 25, 1935, at 10: 30 p. m., eastern standard time. I am for the Wheeler-Rayburn bill and for section 11 of the Senate bill, which includes the so-called "death sentence", because in my opinion, it will only be a "death sentence" of improper practices and will protect the investor in the future and save the rest of his money.

I am disgusted with the propaganda of the holding companies and their fake crying about widows and orphans. My speech, I think, covers the subject fairly well, and it is as follows:

Fellow Americans, the Wheeler-Rayburn bill is the result of 7 years of investigation by the Federal Trade Commission. And your Congressmen have worked harder trying to understand this holding-company problem than on anything else in years. But there has never been a time when a lobby has made it harder for Congressmen to do an honest job for the people than the utility lobby is making it now.

These lobbyists have tremendous sums of your money—investors' money—to spend. Whose millions do you suppose Associated Gas & Electric is spending along with other companies for full-page advertisements? Whose money is paying for the way these lobbyists pack and jam the big hotels in Washington, spending right and left, like oil men who have just brought in a gusher? It's your money, other people's money, the money of those same widows and orphans whom the Power Trust has heretofore robbed, about whom the Power Trust is now weeping. That lobby gets whispering campaigns started, plants insidious statements about honest Congressmen who won't be bullied, scares investors into sending telegrams, does everything possible to keep the country in a bewildered state of fright so it can't think clearly and coolly.

Now, let's get down to some facts. A utility operating company is a company which operates gas and electric plants in local communities. A holding company is nothing more than a finance company which has no business except trying to make profits by playing with the stocks of these operating companies. The rates which you and other consumers pay to the operating companies for gas and electricity you use are the only source of revenue for both the operating companies and for the holding companies, which live like parasites on the operating companies.

Now the Wheeler-Rayburn bill doesn't touch the business or the securities of the operating companies. All it goes after is the holding companies, particularly about 20 giant holding companies, which are so big that they make the trusts which Teddy Roosevelt wanted to bust look like pygmies. These giant holding companies are a series of tricky finance corporations promoted by a few clever men in New York. By buying a few shares of stock in the right place in these trick corporations, these few men control hundreds of operating companies scattered from coast to coast. One giant holding company which controls $1,000,000,000 of assets of operating companies is run by two smart men who have invested only a few hundred thousand dollars of their own, but who manage to control all the rest by rigging up nine tricky holding companies between themselves and the operating companies.

These giant holding companies are the very best examples of the huge concentrations of wealth and power mentioned by the President in his tax message. The gas and electric business is the second largest industry in the United States. But 13—just 13—large utility holding companies control at least 75 percent of that whole industry. Just three of them control over 40 percent of the whole industry. Those three are the Insull properties, J. P. Morgan's United Corporation, and Electric Bond & Share. Think of that in a democratic country! Think of the power the few men at the top of those giant companies have over the economic lives of the rest of us. They control so many jobs—and they control so much business—that they just have to crack the whip and practically all the rest of us citizens have to obey or find ourselves out in the street. The continuance of our whole economic democracy is in danger unless we can pass the Wheeler-Rayburn bill and break up these giant companies into smaller companies, the way we had to break up the Tobacco Trust and Standard Oil.

But what will happen to investors in that process? That's what I want most to talk to you about. First of all, the investor who holds securities in operating companies isn't hurt in the slightest by the bill, because the bill doesn't try to reach operating companies except to make the holding companies get off their necks. Three-quarters of the public's investment in the utility business today is represented by operating securities like that—preferred stocks and bonds of operating companies which the bill doesn't touch. These are the securities which the savings banks and the life-insurance companies and the trustees for colleges and endowments hold. The bill improves that kind of securities, because it saves the operating companies the great sums the holding companies have been milking out of them to support all these dizzy, trick corporations which make up a holding-company system. Now let me repeat that, and don't let the propagandists fool you about it. If you are an investor in the securities of operating companies, this bill can't possibly hurt you, and it almost certainly will help you.

Just tonight I heard a speech in behalf of holding companies by one of my distinguished colleagues. It was another speech imposing on widows and orphans, full of hearts and flowers, which rode around facts like a cowboy at a rodeo. It was entirely based on the assumption that the so-called "death sentence" in the Wheeler-Rayburn bill would make operating companies sell off part of their assets and would make holding companies dump on the market their investments in stocks of operating companies.

I think I can show you that neither of those assumptions is correct. There's absolutely nothing in the bill by which an operating company can be compelled to dispose of its assets. And there's absolutely nothing in the bill that requires holding companies to dump their investments on the market.

As a matter of fact, the bill requires nothing at all of holding companies—get that, nothing at all—if the holding company managers are willing to give up their power over the investment which the public has made in the bonds and preferred stocks of these operating companies and will give those public investors enough voting rights so that the boards of directors of these operating companies will be chosen by those public investors instead of by the holding companies. That is, the bill permits holding companies to hold on indefinitely to their investments in all operating companies, no matter how many they are and how widely they are scattered, if the holding company will turn itself into an investment trust and stop trying to run the affairs of the operating companies. The President expressly pointed that out in his message to Congress. Did you ever think of that?

It is only if the holding companies won't give up their power in this way that the bill requires a certain limited number of the biggest holding companies to regroup their properties and to rearrange their securities. But the holding companies are given 7 years of grace before the Government can even begin to go to the Federal courts to ask those courts to rearrange those properties in the way in which they have rearranged properties before under the Sherman law. And the Securities and Exchange Commission is appointed to protect the investors' interest every inch of the way.

The main reason my colleague gave you tonight for all his scare about the investor was that National Association of Mutual Savings Banks had told him so. Well, let's be blunt. The National Association of Savings Banks maintains a permanent lobbying organization in Washington which has lobbied against every piece of financial legislation designed to clear up conditions for investors that has come before the Congress in these last 3 years. It lobbied its head off against the Securities Act and the Stock Exchange Act.

My colleague also quoted at length from President Woodrow Wilson. But he neglected to tell you that Wilson ran on a platform in 1912 declaring for the "prevention of holding companies." Mr. Wilson said much more, but it happens that he was really the original advocate of the elimination of the holding-company abuses.

It seems to be the policy of the friends of the holding companies to condemn them, referring to them as crooks and thieves, which I have never so far done, and then to ask for their perpetuation. It seems peculiar to me that the friends of the holding companies should criticize them as crooks and thieves and then ask that they be permitted to continue their operations, because they have robbed widows and orphans, and then give them permission to continue their practices on the theory that they will turn honest and treat the widows and orphans in the proper manner in the future. I don't get the logic.

Now, how about the investors who own holding-company securities? If you own securities in a holding company whose operations are carried on in one State, or in a group of States close together and covering a natural economic region, you don't have to worry about any death sentence or any of the other terrible things the propagandists have been telling you about. The death sentence doesn't apply to holding companies which do that kind of a regional business—companies like Niagara Hudson and Public Service of New Jersey, New England Power, Pacific Gas & Electric, Southern California Edison, Consolidated Gas of Baltimore, and Commonwealth Edison of Chicago, Georgia Power Co., and Alabama Power Co. And holding companies like that, to which the death sentence doesn't apply, make up by far the greater part of the holding companies in which the public holds securities.

Now what happens to you under the Wheeler-Rayburn bill if you own securities in one of the giant holding companies which sprawl from one coast to the other and which operate in from 20 to 30 States? First, realize how badly you need Government protection of that investment. You probably bought securities in that kind of a holding company in 1929. Do you remember what the market value of all securities of that kind of holding company was in 1929, when you bought them? It was $19,000,000,000. And do you know what the total value of all those securities is today? It's about $3,000,000,000. And is Franklin D. Roosevelt and the power policy of Franklin D. Roosevelt responsible for that drop? Absolutely not. That drop to $3,000,000,000 occurred before Franklin D. Roosevelt became President. From 1929 to March 1933, holding-company stocks dropped $27 for each dollar it dropped from the time of his inauguration to March 1935. And today—June 1935—that $1 decline during this administration has been made up—has climbed back to and beyond where it had been when he came into office. So not one penny has been lost in the Roosevelt administration, nor since the introduction of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill.

Now that drop represents a loss of 85 percent to investors. Was that lost just because of the depression? No. Because the loss in these holding-company securities is far greater than the loss the depression caused in any other kind of securities. You lost that money because the holding company managers and promoters, who sucked you into supplying them with funds to play with, put your money, not into the sound utility business, but into crazy high-finance schemes, where so many companies were piled one on top of the other that neither you nor anybody else ever knew what your real rights were. And the holding-company managers who did this to you are the same crowd who control those same companies today and are asking you to send telegrams to Congressmen, so we won't let the Government interfere with them when they get ready to take the last of the 15 percent away from you.

But you say, just what does the bill do to your securities? It does just this, it says to those giant companies, "The only assets you have, which can make money to pay dividends and interest on all these holding-company securities you have sold to investors, are your interests in all these gas and electric plants scattered all over the country. You have 5, 6, 7, or 8 trick holding companies and sub holding companies piled up on top of those gas and electric plants, and you've sold investors securities in all those trick companies. All those investors really have—no matter in which of those companies—is some degree of a claim on the earnings of those gas and electric plants.

"Now, you've got to consolidate all those unnecessary intermediate companies that are eating up those earnings in salaries and bonuses and costs of operation, and give all the investors in all those companies securities in not more than one or two simplified companies. That's so investors will know what they've got and so all the costs of running these unnecessary companies—which ultimately comes out of the pocket of the investor—will be eliminated. And that's so that when recovery increases the earnings of those gas and electric plants, the benefit of that increase will go into bigger dividends for investors instead of being squandered in a lot of holding-company operations in high finance."

Now Mr. Investor, how can that hurt you?

Now, another thing the bill says to these giant holding companies is this: "You've got operating gas and electric plants scattered all over this country. You've got a much worse record for the investor than the holding companies which have their gas and electric plants concentrated in a single area. Your talk about diversification for the benefit of the investor is just talk. What were the worst holding companies for the investor? The so-called 'diversified' holding companies—Insull and Associated Gas & Electric, United Corporation, and Electric Bond & Share—the biggest ones of the lot. Your diversification just hasn't worked. The figures show it. And it hasn't worked because absentee management running plants sprawled all over the country just can't do as good a job of management as local management that's really watching local situations."

"So, for the sake of the investor as well as to end your vast concentration of power, you giant holding companies have got to regroup your operating gas and electric plants in regional areas where they really can be managed efficiently; and if they fall into more than one group, you can divide yourself into several regional holding companies and distribute the securities of these new companies proportionately among your investors, just as was done when the Standard Oil and the Tobacco Trust were divided under the Sherman law."

That's all the Wheeler-Rayburn bill says to even the worst of the holding companies. And 7 years—7 long years—with all the court protection you could dream of, is given them to carry out that program. The propagandists' talk of immediate abolition is just a lie.

Now, how can that program hurt the investor?

Fellow Americans, whether your President was ever right before, he's right on the power issue. He knows that issue as well as any man in America, and this Wheeler-Rayburn bill is his own idea—the very heart of his power program. What the holding-company propagandists are saying to you is either that he doesn't know what he is doing or that he is ruthlessly and cruelly willing to destroy the investing class of the Nation, and that instead of believing him you ought to believe the successors of Samuel Insull. They have money enough to repeat that idea often enough so that they almost make you believe it. But when you think it over, doesn't it sound fishy to you?

This holding-company bill does not abolish or confiscate anything you own. It only abolishes financial trickeries which hold and take away your rights.

Remember this Government, this Congress, this President of ours, in which you and I must have faith. Let us stand by it—by ourselves—and not let our Government be kidnaped and become a subsidiary of the holding companies.

CONTROL OF PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 276.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 2796, an act to provide for the control and elimination of public-utility holding companies operating, or marketing securities, in interstate and foreign commerce, and through the mails, to regulate the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce, to amend the Federal Water Power Act, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 8 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce now in the bill, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any of the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole House to the bill or committee substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of S. 2796, commonly called the "Wheeler-Rayburn holding-company bill" or the "Public Utility Act of 1935." It is an open rule, a wide-open rule, more open in some respects than some other open rules. [Laughter.]

The rule provides for 8 hours' general debate. It also permits the House bill, the committee substitute, to be read for amendment as an original bill, allowing amendments to be offered to that bill by any Member of the House.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not now; I shall yield later.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I wish the gentleman would explain the reason for that statement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All right, I shall answer that right now. Where a committee of the House strikes out an entire Senate bill and substitutes its own bill, in order to permit amendments to the House bill, it is fairer to permit the House bill to be read as an original bill, because if it were read as an amendment to the Senate bill you would get into the third-degree-stage amendment one step sooner, because the first amendment to the committee amendment would stop further amendments, whereas if the committee-substitute amendment is read as an original bill there can be amendments to amendments offered to any section. That is one important reason for allowing the committee substitute to be read as an original bill.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Just one short question at this point. Then after the Committee rises and the bill is reported to the House we cannot get a separate vote on the House bill because it has not been brought up as an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is not correct. I was just coming to that. That privilege is set forth in line 14 of page 2 of the rule and is one of the features that makes the rule more open than the usual open rule.

When the Committee rises and reports the bill back to the House with amendments, any Member may demand a separate vote on any amendment to the bill or to the committee amendment. This is an extra privilege. If the House bill were read as an amendment, any amendment thereto would be merged in the amendment, as we saw happen the other day in a District of Columbia bill, and a separate vote could not be had. But under this rule a separate vote may be had on any amendment to the House bill and also on the House bill as a committee amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. But it will not permit us to vote on substituting the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, indeed; it will.

Mr. RANKIN. Let us get this clear.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield for a question, if the gentleman please. The gentleman made a statement; I want to answer it; let me explain it if I may.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When we get back in the House, a separate vote may be demanded on the House bill, the committee substitute. That raises the issue between the House bill and the Senate bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Then we can get a roll call on that proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. On the proposition of substituting the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; exactly. That is specifically provided in the rule and is one of the liberalities of the rule.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Then an amendment may be offered to restore the so-called " death-sentence clause "?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. But no record vote will be possible on the " death sentence " clause?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the Committee of the Whole votes to substitute section 11 of the Senate bill, or something similar, it is an amendment and a record vote can be had.

Mr. KVALE. Yes—if.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, the usual rules of the House do not provide for record votes on amendments offered in the Committee of the Whole and defeated.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman, during the consideration of this rule, yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment to the rule providing for two motions to recommit in order to make certain a House record vote on the proposition of restoring to the bill the " death sentence " clause?

Mr. O'CONNOR. With due respect to the gentleman, I must say I will not so yield, because it is not necessary. Now let me proceed.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman? Why not give us the chance?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield for a question.

Mr. RANKIN. Why not give us the right to offer two motions to recommit, in order that those of us who are opposed to this monstrosity that is now before the House may have an opportunity to vote on what we want? It is the President's desire, I may say to the gentleman from New York, and I think we ought to be given the right to offer two motions to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman has finished his question, I shall answer it. That proposal was thrashed out thoroughly in the Rules Committee. First, to permit two motions to recommit in any rule is a complete violation and undermining of the rules of this House, and in a circumstance like this has never been done.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further at this time. I ask the gentleman please to respect that. I believe I shall answer any question the gentleman has in mind, so please do not interrupt me further.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield. The Chair trusts the gentleman will not interrupt him without his permission.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the motion to recommit is, under the rules of the House, solely for the benefit of the minority, and for nobody else. We do not need rules to protect the rights of the majority; the majority can take care of itself.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a majority of this House can always adopt any measure it desires.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated the rule of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I submit the gentleman has not stated even a point of order, but has made an improper interjection.

Mr. RANKIN. The rules of the House do not permit that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is arguing the rule. It is a question of opinion between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Mississippi. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, there has never been inserted in any rule two motions to recommit, which destroys the privilege and prerogative of the minority, in any case, unless the committee reporting the bill, by committee action, asked that there be two motions to recommit. When the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce appeared before the Rules Committee, we asked him if his committee had asked for two motions to recommit. He said they had not, that he was doing it on his own responsibility.

The bonus bill has been cited as an example, but there is no parallel between the bonus bill and this bill. The Ways and Means Committee by committee action asked the Rules Committee to permit two motions to recommit. Why? Because three bills, the Vinson bill, the Patman bill, and the Tydings bill, were at issue there, not two bills, as in this case. In order to get a vote on all three propositions, they asked for two motions to recommit by committee action.

Years back, in reporting three farm bills, the Agricultural Committee by committee action asked that there be two motions to recommit, but never in the history of this House has there been two motions to recommit in a rule under circumstances such as this, and to build up and permit that precedent to start would destroy the rules of the House.

Why should a majority be protected by a special rule against itself? The minority is not asking for this extra special protection. Why should a majority three times as many as the minority ask for a special rule to protect itself against its own minority? The majority can function at all times. It is the minority that may be imposed upon. Why should a majority of 3 to 1 have to come here and ask for a special rule to protect itself against the minority of its own majority? Once a motion is made to recommit on the majority side of the House, the control of the House shifts to the minority.

It is an absolute reversal of all parliamentary procedure for anyone on the majority side to make a motion to recommit and thereby confess that the control of the House has shifted to the political minority, and that is just what does happen.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that is not the rule of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I submit it is.

Mr. RANKIN. That never has been the rule and never will be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot rule on that matter. That is a question for each individual Member to decide.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman does not raise a point of order. If the gentleman knew the rules of the House he would not be interrupting without first obtaining permission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi should not interrupt the gentleman from New York, who is speaking on the rule, unless the gentleman from New York yields.

Mr. O'CONNOR. You do not have to tear the rules of the House asunder to meet the wish of a minority of a majority or even a majority of a majority.

There is great confusion and a lot of hullabaloo about this matter of the rule, just as there was a lot of propaganda throughout the country from people who never saw a stock certificate, let alone owned one.

Under the rule here, the most liberal rule that could be brought into this House, there will be plenty of opportunity to have a record vote as between the Senate bill and the House bill. There will be plenty of opportunity to have a vote on the death-sentence provision. Five opportunities! Count them!

Mr. Speaker, the big controversy between these two bills is section 11, the so-called "death sentence."

First. I have already explained that if an amendment to the House bill, putting section 11 in it, carries in the Committee of the Whole, that amendment could have a direct roll-call vote when the bill comes back to the House.

Second. When the Committee gets back into the House a separate vote may be demanded on the Committee's substitute, which is the entire House bill. This raises the specific issue between the House bill and the Senate bill. You can take your choice. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] or any other Member will have chance when the Committee gets back into the House to demand a separate vote on the committee's substitute as an entirety, and that vote will be one as between the Senate bill and the House bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. RANKIN. My question is in reference to section 11, which is the very life of the bill. Unless the amendment is adopted in the Committee of the Whole we will not be given an opportunity to take a vote on it in the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes. There will be several chances for that.

Mr. RANKIN. On that one amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; on that amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Even if the amendment is not adopted?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I shall applaud you if you convince me of that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Third, a direct vote could be had on the death sentence under the one motion to recommit.

Fourth, when a conference with the Senate is either asked or agreed to by the House, which seems likely to happen, unless you vote down the House bill and agree to the Senate bill, which would immediately send the Senate bill to the President, a motion to instruct the House conferees to agree to section 11 of the Senate bill will be in order, which will call for a record vote. That is the fourth opportunity.

Mr. RANKIN. But that is not on this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, it is.

Mr. RANKIN. That is after the passage of the bill and when a conference is asked for.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is after the passage in the House, but before either bill becomes a law, that motion will give a record vote on section 11.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question in that connection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman please wait until I pursue the matter further?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman please let me give the fifth method by which you can get a vote in the House on this provision of section 11 of the Senate bill?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman indulge me by permitting me to ask a question at this point?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Please ask the question.

Mr. COX. The opportunity to get a record vote in the House in each instance detailed by the gentleman depends upon the action of some other body.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no, indeed; absolutely not.

Mr. COX. In the first instance, does not the opportunity or the right for a record vote in the House, under the rule, as presented now, depend upon the action of some other body?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Emphatically not.

Now, let me follow by showing the fifth opportunity for a record vote in the House on this question. In the event the Senate requests a conference and the House agrees to the conference asked, then under ordinary procedure, after a successful conference, a report would first be made to and acted upon by the House. Under such circumstances, where the House first acts on the report, a motion to recommit the report to the conferees, with instructions to the House conferees to agree to section 11, would be in order before the question is put upon the adoption of the conference report. There are, therefore, 2 opportunities in the House on the conference report and 3 opportunities in the House while the bill is being considered to have record votes on the Senate bill or section 11 thereof—5 opportunities in all, as I stated at the outset.

That is the parliamentary situation, and this rule permits consideration under the ordinary procedure of the House, except for the two exceptional opportunities granted, of separate votes on amendments to the committee amendment and as between the Senate bill and the committee substitute. I submit this is as fair an opportunity as any bill ever had, and fairer than that had by many other bills of far greater importance. No bill ever had a greater opportunity, and I believe the Rules Committee has done the House a very liberal service in reporting out this rule in this form. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York use a little more time?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understood the minority did not desire any time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is an open rule, and there is no desire on our part to prolong the debate.

Mr. RANKIN and Mr. COX rose.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, that is not fair to the House.

Mr. COX. That procedure should not be tolerated.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine.

The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KVALE and Mr. MCFARLANE) there were—ayes 176, noes 44.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I make the futile demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-two gentleman have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFARLANE) there were—ayes 146, noes 32.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask for a moment to interrogate the gentleman from Colorado, the majority leader?

There are gentlemen who are to speak on this bill, and, as we all know, this is one of the most important bills that has come before this Congress. The chairman of the committee has worked very hard and has expressed a desire to begin the debate tomorrow, and I thoroughly agree with him.

So why not adjourn the House now and take the bill up tomorrow. If we want to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, I think the House will agree to that; but let us wait until tomorrow to begin this debate, so we may have time to read the bill and the report.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Reserving the right to object, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. After the reading of the Journal tomorrow and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, will the first business be the reading of the engrossed copy of the merchant marine bill?

The SPEAKER. That will be the unfinished business. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report for printing under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on S. 1958, to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the cause of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

AUTHORIZING THE USE OF PARK PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BY THE BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2738) to authorize the use of park property in the District of Columbia and its environs by the Boy Scouts of America at their national jamboree.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act to authorize the use of park property in the District of Columbia and its environs by the Boy Scouts of America at their national jamboree

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to lend Army and Navy equipment for use at the national jamboree of the Boy Scouts of America", approved April 1, 1935, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to grant permits through the National Park Service and the Superintendent of National Capital Parks for use by the said Boy Scouts of portions of parks, reservations, or other public spaces under his control in the District of Columbia and environs as in his opinion may be temporarily spared for that purpose: Provided, That such use will inflict no serious or permanent injury upon any of the parks, reservations, or other public spaces: And provided further, That the parks, reservations, or other public spaces, which shall be so used or occupied, shall be promptly restored to their original condition by the Boy Scouts, and the said Boy Scouts shall indemnify the United States for all damages of any kind whatsoever sustained by reason of any such use or occupancy. The privileges and usages granted by the Secretary of the Interior shall include the temporary erection of tents for entertainment, hospitals, commissaries and other subsistence quarters, and other purposes; and the said Boy Scouts are hereby authorized to charge reasonable fees for the use of the same, and to sell articles at said commissaries, which sales shall be solely for the convenience of the participants in the jamboree. The net profits derived from such sales or fees shall be used exclusively to aid in meeting expenses incident to the said jamboree. The sale of foodstuffs in or about such tents or elsewhere upon the public spaces used by the Boy Scouts as authorized by this bill shall be under the supervision of the health officer of the District of Columbia and in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by him. The use and erection of tents shall at all times be subject to the supervision of the fire marshal of the District of Columbia and shall be subject to such regulations as he may prescribe.

"The erection and use of tents for any purpose involving health or sanitation shall be subject to the supervision of the health officer of the District of Columbia and to such regulations as he may prescribe."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSHING HALL

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2917) authorizing an appropriation to the American Legion for its use in effecting a settlement of the remainder due on and the reorganization of Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, and men of the expeditionary forces.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That $482,032.92 of the fund entitled "Recreation fund—Army", created by the War Department Appropriation Act, approved March 4, 1933, is hereby authorized to be appropriated by the Secretary of the Treasury for effecting a settlement of any indebtedness connected with and the reorganization of Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, men, and auxiliary services of the American Expeditionary Forces, to the end that such memorial as so freed from debt and reorganized may be perpetuated: Provided, That the amount herein provided shall not be used for the purposes indicated herein, until the legal title to said property shall have been vested in the Government of the United States for the use and benefit of all American officers and enlisted men of the World War. Any balance not required for settling such indebtedness shall be available for expenditure by and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for the maintenance and/or to secure the perpetuation of such Pershing Hall.

SEC. 2. An itemized report shall be transmitted to the Senate and House of Representatives on the first day of each regular session of Congress of expenditures made in pursuance herewith.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "and the reorganization of."

Page 2, line 10, after the word "War", strike out "Any balance not required for settling such indebtedness shall be available for expenditure by and under the direction of the American Legion, Inc., for the maintenance and/or to secure the perpetuation of such Pershing Hall" and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. Any balance remaining after settlement of such indebtedness shall be retained by the Secretary of the Treasury as a special fund to be known as the 'Pershing Hall Memorial Fund.' The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized (a) to invest and reinvest any part or all of the corpus of this fund so remaining in interest-bearing United States Government bonds and retain custody thereof; and (b) upon request of the American Legion, Inc., the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the national treasurer of the American Legion, Inc., from time to time any part of the earnings upon the fund for use in the maintenance and/or perpetuation of Pershing Hall."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

LET US HAVE A REDISTRIBUTION OF COMMON SENSE

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I delivered over the radio last Monday on the present economic situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered over the radio last Monday:

The greatest obstacle to recovery and the foremost threat to our national security is the unbridled preaching of class hatred and the Utopian schemes of demagogues, political racketeers, and rabble-rousers.

Since the beginning of the depression these false prophets have played upon the emotions of our people with their fantastic and impractical cure-alls. Seizing the opportunity caused by the distress of our people, and their resulting willingness to grasp any straw, these agitators are fast destroying the morale and initiative of the American people by creating the impression that the United States Government owes everyone a living, whether they work for it or not. Their program is based on the naive theory that to make promises of security is to realize them; to give away the taxpayers' money is to make everybody happy; and that bankruptcy never comes when budgets are indefinitely unbalanced. It is not difficult to understand the credulity of those in adversity when Upton Sinclair offers to end poverty, although it was never clear to anybody, including Mr. Sinclair, how this was to be done; when Dr. Townsend proffers the economic monstrosity of $20,000,000,000 annually to those of 60 years of age; when the Senator from Louisiana proposes to share the wealth and make every man a king; and even the President of the United States embarks upon a soak-the-rich program and demands what he calls a "redistribution of wealth." All these chimerical ideas have had their counterpart in history. All through the pathetic annals of man's tortuous and blood-stained journey toward a better economic life there appear these vivid personalities—fanatics, charlatans, self-chosen Messiahs, tyrants, and visionaries—who have played upon the ignorance, credulity, and hopes of men. From the year 66 B. C., when Catiline inflamed the slaves to rebellion by promising to wipe out all debts, through Coxey's leading his ragged army to Washington in 1893, to Senator HUEY LONG and his share-the-wealth movement, there is the endless line of men who have stirred the masses to futile action, often to riot, rebellion, and revolution. It would be a grave misconception of history to assume that all these men were conscienceless demagogues seeking power. While many were exactly that, a few were visionary reformers of the noblest ideals. However, the one outstanding fact is that history fails to show a single case where the rabble-rouser accomplished any good for those who followed him. In nearly every case he injured them, bringing death, or leading to excesses that made their conditions worse—if not that, he accomplished nothing.

The visionaries of the present day have afflicted many of our people with the intellectual malady that economic principles can be changed by legislative manipulation; an idea just as impractical and farcial as to defy the laws of nature by congressional mandate. There is no way, for example, to share the wealth and maintain our present economic system or its productivity. To divide the wealth of Henry Ford, accumulated by genius and industry, would bring no lasting benefits to the recipients, and would in the bargain, take away the jobs, destroy the earning power of thousands who today find employment in that great industrial enterprise. Those who would share the wealth or who would tax private wealth out of existence with a soak-the-rich tax program, might well remember the admonition of Abraham Lincoln when he said, "Property is the fruit of labor, property is desirable, it is a positive good in the world. That some should be rich shows that others may become rich and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise. Let not him, who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built." Why should anyone advocate or support such proposals as the redistribution of, or share-the-wealth plans. When one class earns money it does not have to take it or rob it from the other class. Wealth creates wealth. True security and happiness must be earned, and earned by self-supporting work. All people since the beginning of time who tried to get something for nothing ended up with nothing. We have reached a time in our history when it becomes necessary for every true American to engage in a determined battle to defend and maintain the system and principles upon which our Nation was founded and upon which it has advanced to world economic and moral leadership. Is it not a fact that few, if any, fortunes have increased during the depression; that rich and poor alike have suffered from the crash in 1929? Why then should it not be our ambition and our purpose to rebuild the fortune of all our people. Is not the future of our country dependent upon the well-being and happiness of all the people, rather than any particular group or class? How, you may rightfully ask, can we rebuild the fortunes of all? I humbly suggest; first, adhere to that most fundamental statement in the Declaration of Independence, that "all men are created equal", and let us forget class prejudice. Second, remove the menace of destructive legislation, now before Congress, which hangs like a sword of Damocles over business recovery. Remove these obstructions and release the flood waters of prosperity.

A home market estimated between seventy-five and eighty-five billion dollars, with work for nearly everyone, awaits the restoration of the confidence of the investing public and business leaders of the Nation. Col. Leonard Ayers, the noted statistician, states: "The shortages in the output of industrial goods that have accumulated during the depression amounts to the complete normal output of all the durable-goods industry for 2½ years. In order to make up for that shortage those industries will have to operate 25 percent above their normal rates of active production for the next 10 years. In other words, in order to catch up to normal it will take 25 percent more men and women working every day for the next 10 years than was required by the peak production years of 1927, 1928, 1929." This work is held back because of political interference, because many of our laws now in effect, and those proposed, are not to help the 95 percent who are honest, but to put the same strait-jacket on them that we put on the 5 percent who are dishonest. We are killing the goose that laid the golden egg.

As a Member of Congress I am just as interested, and sincerely so, in improving conditions of those who toil, but I feel that we have had enough theory, enough panaceas, and that it is high time for us to be practical. Restore man's right to that which he earns, which is the driving force that has created national vitality. Restore the integrity of the Government and its obligations by at least attempting to balance the national Budget. Discontinue excessive and wasteful expenditures.

It would seem to me that any political party could retain the affection and support of our people by helping them return to their natural field of employment, rather than by maintaining them through a gigantic political machine on the pay roll or on the dole. Keep the individual the master rather than the slave of the State. Limit the power of politics to the bounds prescribed and dictated by the Constitution of the United States. I submit in closing: The restoration of economic security for the American people depends not upon the favor of any one class, nor upon a redistribution of wealth, but rather upon a redistribution of common sense.

THE ALIEN MENACE TO AMERICA

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a recent radio address which I delivered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I have delivered before numerous civic, fraternal, and patriotic organizations in different States, and which I recently delivered on June 21 over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co., under the auspices of more than 100 patriotic societies, with some four or five million members listening in. In view of the fact that my time was limited to 30 minutes, I was compelled to abbreviate parts of my speech, but I am here including the speech in full:

My fellow Americans—and by the term Americans I mean all citizens of this country whether naturalized or native born, and regardless of the church, race, or political party to which you belong the homogeneous group of 3,000,000 people who established this Republic and laid deep and strong the institutions of freedom were motivated by one purpose and dominated by one desire. They wanted to safeguard by written guaranties the fullest degree of religious, economic, and political freedom consistent with the public welfare. The course chosen by them in defying the trained soldiers of England with material odds heavy against them, was not an easy one. They could have acquiesced in the oppressive rule of European collectivism with far greater assurances and prospects of personal safety and economic security. They put their lives and fortunes in dire jeopardy when they declared their separation from foreign rule and influence. But so priceless was liberty to them in comparison with the material comforts of life that they preferred poverty and hunger to economic dictatorship and death to slavery. After they had achieved the independence of America they were faced with another momentous decision. The influential and wealthy Federalists wanted to establish a strong central government with the smallest possible degree of State and local sovereignty.

They pointed out that a strong Federal government by reason of its greater efficiency could better promote economic security and bring about more uniformity in laws and institutions. Our fathers did not fall for this bait. While conceding the advantages of centralized government, they insisted that the most priceless possession of mankind was freedom and that the experiences of all nations and peoples had shown that freedom seldom survived the establishment of centralized governments.

With jealous care and uncanny wisdom they devised the most complete system of constitutional guaranties the world has ever seen. They declared in unmistakable terms that there were certain inherent and inalienable rights which neither local nor Federal Government could take away from the people. They established the eternal principle that not even the most overwhelming majority could impose its will upon a helpless minority in respect to those inherent rights. The Federal Government was, therefore, vested with a limited jurisdiction which was clearly defined. To prevent the centralization of undelegated power in the Federal Government, it was plainly provided that all power not delegated to the National Government by specific wording or fair implication was expressly reserved by the States and the people. Even this limited and circumscribed Federal jurisdiction was divided among three separate and distinct branches—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive—with a system of checks and balances to prevent the encroachment of one branch upon the jurisdiction of another. So that the whole framework of the American Government is like so many concentric circles, each in proportion to its nearness to the people being vested with the greatest possible jurisdiction. This system was essentially American and wholly unlike any form of government that ever existed in any other country. It was based upon a political philosophy and a conception of the rights of man which have remained unique to this very day. It was formulated by men whose understanding of the lessons of history and whose vision of the future were not obscured by the ancient prejudices that had grown up with older societies. It was wisely designed to combine in one constitutional fabric of enduring texture the maximum advantages of the principal forms of government that had existed in the past with a minimum of their disadvantages. And so it may be said that out of the experiences of ages and the wisdom of time our fathers combined in one great constitutional structure the authority of law and the security of property with a liberty of discussion and a freedom of individual action never before known.

Under these wise and liberal institutions the 3,000,000 Americans of 1776 increased to 31,000,000 in 1860. Only about 4,000,000 of this population increase was due to immigration. Our attachment to the Constitution was so deep that we fought 4 years over its correct interpretation. From the conclusion of that unfortunate struggle until 1930 the great alien invasion of the United States took place. From the foreign stock of about 4,000,000 in 1860 we grew to a foreign stock of more than 40,000,000 in 1930.

No other country has ever witnessed such an alien influx, with the possible exception of Rome, and the best authorities concede that the major factor which produced the fall of Rome was immigration. No other nation could have survived this invasion. Lecky in his History of European Morals described the important part played by immigration in producing the decline and fall of Rome. He says:

"Together with these influences, many others of a kindred nature may be detected. The colonial policy which the Gracchi had advocated was carried out at Narbonne, and during the latter days of Julius Caesar, to the amazement and scandal of the Romans, Gauls of this Province obtained seats in the senate. The immense extent of the Empire made it necessary for numerous troops to remain during long periods of time in distant Provinces, and the foreign habits that were thus acquired began the destruction of the exclusive feelings of the Roman Army, which the subsequent enrollment of barbarians completed. The public games, the immense luxury, the concentration of power, wealth, and genius, made Rome the center of a vast and ceaseless concourse of strangers, the focus of all the various philosophies and religions of the Empire, and its population soon became an amorphous, heterogeneous mass, in which all nations, customs, languages, and creeds, all degrees of virtue and vice, of refinement and barbarism, of scepticism and credulity, intermingled and interacted. Traveling had become more easy and perhaps more frequent than it has been at any other period before the nineteenth century. The subjection of the whole civilized world to a single rule removed the chief obstacles to locomotion. Magnificent roads, which modern nations have rarely rivaled and never surpassed, intersected the entire Empire, and relays of post horses enabled the voyager to proceed with an astonishing rapidity.

"The sea, which, after the destruction of the fleets of Carthage, had fallen almost completely under the dominion of pirates, had been cleared by Pompey. The European shores of the Mediterranean and the port of Alexandria were thronged with vessels. Romans traversed the whole extent of the Empire on political, military, or commercial errands, or in search of health, or knowledge, or pleasure. The entrancing beauties of Como and of Tempe, the luxurious manners of Baiae and Corinth, the schools, commerce, climate, and temples of Alexandria, the soft winters of Sicily, the artistic wonders and historic recollections of Athens and the Nile, the great colonial interests of Gaul attracted their thousands, while Roman luxury needed the products of the remotest lands, and the demand for animals for the amphitheater spread Roman enterprise into the wildest deserts. In the capital the toleration accorded to different creeds was such that the city soon became a miniature of the world. Almost every variety of charlatanism and of belief displayed itself unchecked and boasted its train of proselytes. Foreign ideas were in every form in the ascendant. Greece, which had presided over the intellectual development of Rome, acquired a new influence under the favoring policy of Hadrian, and Greek became the language of some of the later as it had been of the earliest writers. Egyptian religions and philosophies excited the wildest enthusiasm. As early as the reign of Augustus there were many thousands of Jewish residents at Rome, and their manners and creed spread widely among the people. The Carthaginian Apuleius, the Gaula Florus and Favorinus, the Spaniards Lucan, Columella, Martial, Seneca, and Quintilian had all in their different departments a high place in Roman literature or philosophy.

"In the slave world a corresponding revolution was taking place. The large proportion of physicians and sculptors who were slaves, the appearance of three or four distinguished authors in the slave class, the numerous literary slaves imported from Greece, and the splendid examples of courage, endurance, and devotion to their masters furnished by slaves during the civil wars, and during some of the worst periods of the Empire, were bridging the chasm between the servile and the free classes, and the same tendency was more powerfully stimulated by the vast numbers and overwhelming influence of the freedmen. The enormous scale and frequent fluctuations of the great Roman establishments, and the innumerable captives reduced to slavery after every war, rendered manumission both frequent and easy, and it was soon regarded as a normal result of faithful service. Many slaves bought their freedom out of the savings which their masters always permitted them to make. Others paid for it by their labor after their emancipation. Some masters emancipated their slaves in order to obtain their part in the distribution of corn, others to prevent the discovery of their own crimes by the torture of their slaves, others through vanity, being desirous of having their funerals attended by a long train of freedmen, very many simply as a reward for long service. The freedman was still under what was termed the 'patronage' of his former master; he was bound to him by what in a later age would have been called a feudal tie, and the political and social importance of a noble depended in a very great degree upon the multitude of his clients. The children of the emancipated slave were in the same relation to the patron, and it was only in the third generation that all disqualifications and restraints were abrogated. In consequence of this system, manumission was often the interest of the master. In the course of his life he enfranchised individual slaves. On his deathbed or by his will he constantly emancipated multitudes. Emancipation by testament acquired such dimensions, that Augustus found it necessary to restrict the power; and he made several limitations, of which the most important was that no one should emancipate by his will more than 100 of his slaves. It was once proposed that the slaves should be distinguished by a special dress, but the proposition was abandoned because their number was so great that to reveal to them their strength would be to place the city at their mercy. Even among those who were not slaves, the element that was derived from slavery soon preponderated. The majority of the free population had probably either themselves been slaves, or were descended from slaves, and men with this tainted lineage penetrated to all the offices of the State. 'There was', as has been well said, 'a circulation of men from all the universe. Rome received from them slaves, and sent them back Romans.

"It is manifest how profound a change had taken place since the republican days when the highest dignities were long monopolized by a single class, when the censors repressed with a stringent severity every form or exhibition of luxury, when the rhetoricians were banished from the city lest the faintest tinge of foreign manners should impair the stern simplicity of the people, and when the proposal to transfer the capital to Veii, after a great disaster, was rejected on the ground that it would be impious to worship the Roman deities anywhere but on the capitol, or for the flamens and the vestals to emigrate beyond the walls.

"The greater number of these tendencies to universal fusion or equality were blind forces resulting from the stress of circumstances and not from any human forethought, or were agencies that were put in motion for a different object. It must, however, be acknowledged that a definite theory of policy had a considerable part in accelerating the movement. The policy of the Republic may be broadly described as a policy of conquest, and that of the empire as a policy of preservation. The Romans having acquired a vast dominion were met by the great problem which every first-class power is called upon to solve—by what means many communities, with different languages, customs, characters, and traditions can be retained peaceably under a single ruler. In modern times this difficulty has been most successfully met by local legislatures which, if they supply a 'line of cleavage', a nucleus around which the spirit of opposition may form, have on the other hand the priceless advantage of giving the annexed people a large measure of self-government, a center and safety valve of local public opinion, a sphere for local ambitions, and a hierarchy of institutions adapted to the distinctive national type. Under no other conditions can a complex empire be carried on with so little strain, or effort, or humiliation, or its inevitable final dissolution be effected with so little danger or convulsion. But local legislatures, which are the especial glory of English statesmanship, belong exclusively to modern civilization. The Roman method of conciliation was first of all the most ample toleration of the customs, religion, and municipal freedom of the conquered, and then their gradual admission to the privileges of the conqueror. By confiding to them in a great measure the defense of the Empire, by throwing open to them the offices of state, and especially by according to them the right of Roman citizenship, which had been for centuries jealously restricted to the inhabitants of Rome, and was afterward only conceded to Italy and cis-Alpine Gaul, the Emperors sought to attach them to their throne. The process was very gradual, but the whole movement of political emancipation attained its completion when the imperial throne was occupied by the Spaniard Trajan, and by Pertinax, the son of a freedman, and when an edict of Caracalla extended the rights of Roman citizenship to all the provinces of the Empire.

"It will appear evident from the foregoing sketch that the period which elapsed between Panaetius and Constantine exhibited an irresistible tendency to cosmopolitanism. The convergence, when we consider the number, force, and harmony of the influences that composed it, is indeed unexampled in history. The movement extended through all the fields of religious, philosophical, political, industrial, military, and domestic life. The character of the people was completely transformed, the landmarks of all its institutions were removed, the whole principle of its organization was reversed. It would be impossible to find a more striking example of the manner in which events govern character, destroying old habits and associations, and thus altering that national type of excellence which is, for the most part, the expression or net moral result of the national institutions and circumstances. The effect of the movement was, no doubt, in many respects evil, and some of the best men, such as the elder Cato and Tacitus, opposed it as leading to the demoralization of the Empire; but if it increased vice, it also gave a peculiar character to virtue. It was impossible that the conception of excellence, formed in a society where everything conspired to deepen class divisions and national jealousies and antipathies, should be retained unaltered in a period of universal intercourse and amalgamation. The moral expression of the first period is obviously to be found in the narrower military and patriotic virtues; that of the second period in enlarged philanthropy and sympathy."

It is to the genius of the American institutions and people and their capacity for self-government that we must attribute our survival. I do not mean to imply that there were not many splendid people who came during this period and who are as good Americans as those whose forefathers came on the Mayflower. But I do mean to state that the sudden and indiscriminate entrance of so many different races, with so many antagonistic views and different social, political, and economic ideas and backgrounds, was a severe shock to our political and economic institutions, from which we will not recover for a long time.

The most acute and distressing problem that confronts us is that of unemployment. We have already spent billions of dollars in an effort to furnish jobs and relief to the 10,000,000 idle people in the Nation. Innumerable plans and schemes have been proposed to cure this economic disorder. We have embraced new and untried experiments to cope with this serious situation. We are now preparing to spend nearly $5,000,000,000 to put 3,500,000 idle people to work, and we are making radical changes in our economic laws in an effort to prevent the recurrence of this condition.

Professors, economists, and politicians have cited many causes of unemployment. Some of them hold to the opinion that the capitalistic system has failed and that we must embrace state socialism to furnish employment to our people. Others contend that we must retain the principal features of capitalism but drastically modify its technique in conformity with the industrial changes that have occurred in the past 20 years.

PRIMARY CAUSE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

It is a strange paradox that while so many learned theorists have been busy discovering causes of the unemployment and proposing remedies of every character and description few leaders have pointed out the fundamental cause of unemployment in this country.

It is, of course, true that many factors combined to produce the wide-spread and prolonged unemployment in this country. The unparalleled credit inflation prior to 1929, which was succeeded by inevitable deflation, the introduction of labor-saving devices which displace man power, the severe disparity between agricultural and industrial prices, with the consequent impairment of the farmers' purchasing power and the serious decline of export trade, which normally furnishes employment to 10,000,000 people, were all important but secondary causes of unemployment. The primary cause was immigration. If we had not permitted millions of aliens to enter this country, the secondary causes which I have enumerated would not have been sufficient to produce any serious unemployment in this country, although we would have no doubt experienced an economic depression.

During the tragic days when industrial greed and legislative stupidity encouraged millions of impoverished aliens to invade our shores in hungry quest of jobs and fortunes many patriotic people in America exerted their influence to the utmost in an effort to obtain a reversal of this short-sighted policy and avert the social, economic, and political evils which unrestricted immigration has never failed to produce in the experiences of nations and peoples. If the Nation had awakened at that time to the folly of its immigration policy and refused admission to the 20,000,000 or more of aliens that have since joined the competitive ranks of industry, agriculture, and labor, it is reasonable to believe that the unemployment problem would never have assumed such serious proportions in this country. In fact, it is improbable that a labor surplus would have been known in this age and generation. It is safe to say that we invited the evils of the Old World's political, economic, and social disorders by offering our fertile lands and priceless resources, which our fathers designed as a heritage for their children, as a refuge for the jobless and malcontents of Europe.

OUR FOOLISH IMMIGRATION POLICY

Industrial greed, which subordinated the ultimate good of the country for the temporary profits that cheap pauper labor seemed to promise, combined with that maudlin sentimentality which has ever been the curse of America and the principal source of many of the ills which we have brought upon ourselves, dictated this unwise and destructive policy. That this short-sighted policy is responsible for the present unemployment can be proven by simple mathematics. We now have in this country 16,500,000 foreign born and 7,500,000 aliens, according to my recent estimates. We have approximately 10,000,000 unemployed. If we had refused admission to the 16,500,000 foreign born who are living in this country today we would have no unemployment problem to distress and harass us. Even if we had excluded the 7,500,000 aliens who are living in this Nation, at this very moment our unemployment would be normal.

We can make the point still more forcible by confining our consideration to the aliens who are illegally in this country. Conservative estimates demonstrate that there are about 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country today. Many of these aliens were smuggled into the United States. Large numbers crossed the Mexican and Canadian borders surreptitiously. We have accurate figures to prove that 500,000 aliens came into this country unlawfully as seamen. Under the law, an alien seaman is entitled to land on our shores and remain here for 90 days. Five hundred thousand of such aliens deserted their ships in the past 13 years and were lost in the great cities of the East. In 1900 there were only 103,393 Mexicans in the entire United States, according to the census. In 1930 the census showed 1,422,533, or an increase of 1,276 percent.

NUMBER OF ALIENS ILLEGALLY HERE

When we say that there are 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country we are giving a conservative estimate. It must not be forgotten that this class of aliens avoid the census enumerators and that in the absence of registration or some accurate method, it is impossible to say definitely how many are here. As a result of long study and careful investigation, it is my own opinion that we may have as many as five or six million aliens who are unlawfully in the United States.

As an indication of the number of aliens entering this country illegally, I refer to the recent testimony of the Commissioner of Immigration, Mr. MacCormack. He estimated that the value of seizures by the border patrol of vehicles used in smuggling aliens for the year 1933 was $283,744. This included 13 airships valued at $89,500. There are, of course, many more airships and vehicles used to smuggle aliens into this country that are never seized.

Of the 7,500,000 aliens who are in this country there are from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 on public relief. This leaves about 6,000,000 aliens who are deriving their livelihood from jobs which American citizens should fill and would fill if we had the same laws that are in force in other countries. So that, from any angle of approach it must be evident to every thinking American citizen that the unemployment problem was transferred to America from foreign lands. Our unemployment problem is, therefore, foreign and not American. Foreign countries "dumped" their unemployment problem upon our shores. I do not see how anyone can deny this obvious truth.

I am aware of the fact that the Commissioner of Immigration, Col. D. W. MacCormack, made a statement on June 20, 1935, to the Immigration Committee in which he attacked the figures I have used in reference to the number of aliens who are illegally in this country. He said that the figure, 3,500,000, is a gross exaggeration and that the total number who either entered illegally or who cannot after the lapse of years prove their legal entry is less than 400,000. In the time allotted to me it is impossible for me to advance detailed proof in substantiation of my figure, but let us briefly analyze the Commissioner's statement. In the first place, it must be borne in mind, as the Commissioner admits, that we have no official record of illegal entrants. Therefore we must go to sources of information other than the official figures of the Immigration and Census Bureaus. Everyone knows that an alien unlawfully in the country will avoid the census enumerators, and certainly conceal his presence from the Immigration Bureau, which is charged with the duty of deporting him. In the Commissioner's statement he says that instead of 500,000 alien seamen deserting in the past 13 years, as I have repeatedly charged, that only 164,808 actually deserted. The Commissioner is relying upon the reports of the shipowners, and it is well known that many of the shipowners only report a small number of actual desertions. Evidence before the Senate and House committees has shown beyond any question that aliens have paid as high as $1,500 to some ship officials to permit them to sail under the guise of a seaman and desert when they reached American shores. Naturally, ship officials who are in collusion with the alien, or who are subject to a fine, would not disclose the desertion to the Immigration Bureau. We have the statement of Mr. Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, that at least 500,000 immigrants have unlawfully entered the United States disguised as seamen since 1921. We have the statement of the Senate and House Immigration Committees in their favorable reports on the seamen bill that this figure is correct. We have the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration in 1931 to show that from 1907 to 1931 there were recorded desertions of 307,320. We even have the statement of Colonel MacCormack in his annual report for the year ended June 30, 1933, as follows:

"In the past oftentimes as many as half of the crew of vessels of certain flags, passed as bona fide seamen, would desert in port and when the vessel came to sail the master would sign on none, or very few, others to replace them, a plain indication that the crew was excessive upon arrival, and a moral certainty that aliens had been signed on for a consideration and with foreknowledge that illegal entry into the United States was planned. This is one of the many 'rackets' to circumvent the immigration laws, but is not actionable unless convincing and corroborative evidence of conspiracy is obtained, which is almost impossible, as the deserters speedily lose themselves in our population."

To prove that the 1933 statement of Colonel MacCormack was correct, we have only to refer to the testimony of Andrew Feruseth, president of the American Seamen of America, which shows that there are twice as many desertions as are actually recorded. As a result of careful investigation he found that, "Comparison between the number given by the masters of 10 vessels and the number furnished to consular offices in New York showed an increase in the consular offices of 40 percent, and that comparison was made in New York alone and in 10 firms only."

The Commissioner cites census figures which he says disposes of my charge that there are 500,000 Mexicans illegally here. As I have already shown, there are no official records to show how many Mexicans entered this country illegally. But the Secretary of Labor in 1929 said: "We estimate that more than 1,000,000 Mexicans are illegally in this country." In order for Mexicans to enter this country legally they are required to pass the literacy test. According to the last census of Mexico, only one-fifth of its population could read and write. Applying the same percentage to the Mexicans who came to the United States, we would be justified in saying that four-fifths of them did not pass the literacy test and, therefore, came in violation of the law.

In the Commissioner's statement of June 20, 1935, he said that "Immigration border patrol has, however, been so effective in recent years that there have been comparatively few successful illegal entries" from Mexico. However, in the annual report for the year ended June 30, 1933, he said, "Illegal entries have not greatly decreased on the Mexican border." The truth is that the Labor Department has no accurate idea of the number of aliens illegally in this country. The very fact that the Labor Department is seeking to obtain nearly $5,000,000 to make a complete census of foreign-born persons in the United States demonstrates this fact. If the official figures of the Census Bureau and the Immigration Bureau were reliable, why does the Secretary of Labor want this much money to determine how many aliens are here unlawfully? However, there is a definite way that we can settle this question. Will the Labor Department join with me in securing a bill requiring the registry of all aliens?

As to the Commissioner's statement that there is in this country today an antialien prejudice which affects directly or indirectly a third of our population, I want to make it plain that neither myself nor the restriction forces with which I have been associated in this fight are actuated by the slightest prejudice toward the foreign-stock population. Our fight for restriction and deportation is as much in the interest of the foreign-stock American citizens as the native-born citizens. If any effort is being made to appeal to prejudice it comes from those enemies of restriction who would seek to becloud the economic issue involved by making it appear that the question is one of race or religion or alien prejudice. There is nothing in my bill and proposal that will not benefit the foreign-stock American citizens the same as the native-born citizens.

WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO?

But you ask, and properly so, what are we going to do about it? We have these aliens in the United States and how can we get rid of them. I agree with you that there is nothing we can do so long as our immigration policy is dominated by sentimentality, fatuous internationalism, industrial greed, and alien political influence. So long as we permit America to be made the asylum for the peoples of other lands and the dumping ground for Europe, and so long as politicians fear the vote and influence of alien groups and blocs in the great cities, there is nothing that we can do except to continue to struggle with the unemployment problem of other nations and tax our people to the limit of endurance to provide relief for the 1,500,000 aliens and for the 9,000,000 Americans whose jobs have been taken by foreigners. But when the time comes, as surely it will, that we adopt and develop an American policy based not upon racial and religious hatred but upon the stern law of self-preservation and the ancient truth that charity should begin at home, there is much that we can do. In the first place, we can permanently close, lock, and bar the gates of this country to any pioneer immigration and then throw the keys away. There is certainly no need for immigration during the next 50 years. We will have our hands full to furnish employment to the natural increase of our own population, and to give to the youth of today and tomorrow their place underneath the sun.

THE HARDSHIP ARGUMENT

Of course, the antirestrictionists employ the threadbare argument that we have already reduced immigration to a minimum and that under the quota only 150,000 immigrants can come to this country annually from quota countries. It is pointed out that immigration to the United States has been trivial and unimportant since 1930. It is true that on September 8, 1930, the White House issued a press release pointing out that the public-charge clause had a special significance in times of widespread unemployment, and as a result of the strict interpretation of the public-charge provision, from September 8, 1930, until recently the number of aliens entering under the quota dwindled to a low level.

By reason of the strict enforcement of this section, about 900,000 aliens who might have been admitted during normal times were prevented from entering the United States to increase unemployment. In the 4 fiscal years 1931–34, 594,766 aliens expressed their desire to immigrate. Of this number 401,564 were denied visas because the consuls held that they were likely to become public charges. Although it is known throughout the world that the unemployment problem is very serious in this country, 203,314 aliens have requested that their names be kept upon the waiting lists, so that they can enter the United States for residence as soon as the law permits.

THE ALIEN HORDE READY TO ENTER

The American consuls estimate that in 47 out of 68 quota countries there are at this very moment 992,000 aliens who are anxious to enter the United States in spite of the unemployment here.

It must not be forgotten that the 900,000 aliens prevented from entering this country since 1930 were only kept out by unusual administrative action and not by law. This administrative reduction is admittedly to last only during the acute stages of the depression. As Mr. Simmons, Chief of the Visa Division, Department of State, said in his press release of April 30, 1934, "With the improvement in economic conditions, which is already setting in, the significance of the public-charge clause will proportionately decrease." In the same release, he also said, "As regards quota immigration, however, we find a very interesting recent change. The total of visas issued under the quotas is now 53 percent higher than a year ago, although we must remember that we are making our comparison with an all-time low ebb of immigration into the United States."

In other words, administrative strictness in interpreting the public-charge provision is now being relaxed, until we will soon be admitting from quota countries 153,000 aliens each year. This is proven by the fact that last year's immigration statistics show an increase of 50 percent in quota immigration—that is, new-seed immigrants—an 8-percent increase in total aliens admitted, and a 60-percent decrease in alien deportations, as well as a 50-percent increase in deserting seamen, alien stowaways, and the like. During the 10 years of quota restriction, 3,687,547 aliens of all classes have legally entered this country, 2,010,896 of whom were new immigrants. No other country has had or would ever tolerate any such alien influx, and it is no wonder that our last census revealed the greatest foreign-stock population in our whole history. Last year we admitted legally over 163,000 aliens of all classes, and no doubt as many more entered illegally. But while the 1924 quota law did reduce the number of aliens coming legally from quota countries, a serious mistake was made when the quota was not applied to the Western Hemisphere. This left both side doors open, and predatory employers and profit-seeking steamship companies were quick to take advantage of this mistake. These nonquota countries, and especially Mexico, supplied the cheap pauper labor that had formerly come from southern and eastern Europe. The legal and illegal entries from the nonquota countries, together with the increased smuggling of aliens and the desertion of alien seamen from quota nations, have done much to neutralize the beneficial effects of the 1924 Immigration Act. In other words, while we closed some of the doors, we left others open, and through these open doors aliens continued to enter in large numbers.

PRESENT LAW INSUFFICIENT

I think that I have shown that the quota law is wholly inadequate and that we cannot depend upon temporary administrative action to properly control immigration; and even if the quota laws were sufficient, the fact that there are no effective restrictions against immigration from the nonquota countries nullifies the effect of the quota law.

WHAT THE DIES BILL WILL DO

My bill H. R. 5921 proposes to reduce the quota 60 percent. This will leave 40 percent of the present quota to be used to gradually reunite families. New-seed immigration will be permanently stopped. My bill also applies the quota to the Western Hemisphere so that under its terms, with the exception of near relatives admitted gradually under the quota to reunite families, all immigration will be a thing of the past. Of course, my bill does not interfere with tourists, visitors, clergymen, etc., who come here for temporary periods and not for permanent residence.

My bill also provides that all aliens admitted for permanent residence in this country must take steps to qualify for citizenship 12 months from date and those aliens who fail to do so will be promptly deported. Since the 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country cannot qualify for citizenship, they will be immediately deported. My bill also provides for the deportation of alien criminals, Communists, dope peddlers, smugglers, gangsters, and the like. I know that one of the specious arguments used against my bill is the so-called "hardship" cases. Although much is being said and printed about the alleged separation of families, the facts do not show any basis for these charges. According to the State Department, during the period October 1, 1930, to December 31, 1933, of more than 1,700 section 4 (a) relative applicants from Germany, visas were refused by our consulate general there, on public-charge grounds, to only 12. The State Department says that the same low percentage of refusals exists in the cases of the immediate families of foreign residents in this country. Under my bill the 40 percent remaining after the quota is reduced 60 percent will be used to gradually reunite families as economic conditions in this country permit. However, my bill will not even permit relatives to enter if they are likely to become public charges or take jobs away from Americans.

DIES BILL WILL NOT WORK UNDUE HARDSHIPS

I know it will be charged that it will result in many hardship cases to deport the millions of aliens unlawfully in this country. In regard to hardship cases resulting from deportation the Commissioner of Immigration, Mr. MacCormack, admitted that not more than 5 percent of all deportation cases could be properly classified as hardship cases. When it is considered that this percentage took into consideration the five-hundred-and-some-odd carry-overs from the previous year, it can be conservatively stated that not more than 3 percent are bona fide hardship cases. In my opinion 3,500,000 aliens who are unlawfully in this country can be deported without working undue hardship upon them or their families. Of course, in the enforcement of any law someone must suffer. When a criminal is sent to the penitentiary his wife and family are compelled to suffer, but no one will contend that we should let these criminals go unpunished simply because their families will suffer. There is one sure way that the alien can prevent the separation of families and that is to take his family back to the old country with him, or not to come to this country unless he can bring his family with him. So it will not be the Government that is separating the families. It will be the families themselves who prefer to remain in the United States rather than to go to their native country with their deported relative. It is a question of who shall suffer, American citizens or the alien and his relatives. As between the two, it is the alien who should suffer. When he entered the country unlawfully he knew that he was violating our laws and subjecting himself to punishment. America is not responsible for his suffering, and why should our own citizens be punished to keep the alien from paying the price of his own misconduct.

As to the individual cases of unusual merit, where the alien was merely guilty of a technical breach, or where the records were improperly kept, I am perfectly willing that special bills shall be passed granting clemency. But I am not willing that discretionary powers shall be vested in some Secretary of Labor who may or may not be sympathetic with restriction, to deport or not to deport, as he or she sees fit.

GIVE JOBS TO AMERICANS

Not only must we permanently exclude new immigration from every country and deport the aliens unlawfully in our midst, but we must go one step further. We must pass a law similar to that in force in all other enlightened nations that will make it impossible for any employer to employ any alien so long as American citizens are walking the streets in search of jobs. If the 3,500,000 aliens in our midst are deported and new-seed immigration permanently excluded and every job given to Americans before any alien can be employed, the unemployment problem will be largely solved in the United States and there will be no need to appropriate billions of dollars out of the Treasury to furnish relief and work. This would constitute a major act of permanent recovery and would not violate the Constitution or constitute any departure from fundamental principles or the ancient landmarks of the fathers.

WHAT OTHER COUNTRIES ARE DOING

I know that there are sentimentalists, internationalists, and some greedy employers in this country, and politicians kow-towing to alien-minded voters, who will denounce this program as un-American. It makes no difference to them that all other enlightened countries have adopted drastic measures in the protection of their nationals. Under the laws of Mexico, restrictions as applied to immigrants require an investment in industry or agriculture of 20,000 pesos, or a sufficient independent income. A large group of aliens are excluded altogether. In Sweden aliens who arrive must show passports properly stamped, and the alien's entry and departure are recorded by the police. Aliens intending to take any form of employment, whether employed in Sweden or abroad, must secure a permit from the social board, which first obtains opinions from the public employment bureau, employers and workers in the trade and locality concerned. Belgium is curtailing the immigration of foreign labor and is giving all available jobs to Belgians before any alien can be employed.

The control of aliens residing in France is so close that admission formalities are less severe than our own, but aliens obtaining visas for France have their passports stamped with "not to occupy any salaried position." Argentina is so strict in the enforcement of her immigration laws that, with the exception of close relatives of residents, immigration has practically ceased. In the Netherlands no employer can employ a foreigner without written authorization from the Minister of Social Affairs, and this authorization is not given if they have a single citizen who can fill the available job. In Great Britain an alien cannot enter without a permit from the Ministry of Labor. Such permits are issued, not to the immigrant but to the prospective employer, and then only when he can show that no British subject is available to fill the particular job. This means, in effect, that only highly skilled specialists are admitted. In Germany immigration is effectually restricted by the fact that "permits to work", which are necessary for the obtainment of employment, are denied the aliens. Foreigners in Germany can be compelled to transfer to Germany financial means possessed abroad and receive marks therefor. Since these countries have set the example, is there any reason why we should not follow it in protection of our own citizens?

THE COMMUNIST PARADE

On May 1, while I was in New York, I witnessed a parade of 100,000 Communists. I did not see an American in the crowd. Many of them are aliens that should be deported, and others are foreign born who should have their naturalization papers canceled. Not a one carried an American flag, and they openly insulted and derided everything that we hold sacred in America. Well dressed and apparently well fed, they sang the Internationale and treated with base ingratitude the land that feeds them. Although they are infinitely better off than the starving peasants of Russia they prefer the Russian Government to the American. What would happen in Russia if 100,000 people marched through the streets of Moscow singing The Star-Spangled Banner and advocating the overthrow of the Russian Government and the establishment of the American system in its place? The ruthlessness with which the Soviet government has massacred its enemies demonstrates what would happen. There would be 100,000 less people in Russia than before the parade.

IMMIGRATION BROUGHT ALIEN DOCTRINES

Our immigration policy is responsible for the 40,000,000 foreign stock in this country and the resulting unemployment problem. It accomplished more than the importation of a labor surplus. We introduced into our midst alien political, economic, and social ideas. There can be no compromise between the American system and the foreign. Our conception of individual liberty, private initiative, and inherent rights of the citizenship is diametrically opposed to the theory of collectivism and state socialism which prevails in most of the foreign lands; communism, socialism, fascism, and Hitlerism have one underlying principle in common. They hold that the individual should be the pawn or creature of the State; that the State is everything and the individual nothing. They destroy freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience. None of these systems rest on the active growth or moral value of the individuals, without whom the State is a fiction or a monster. Mussolini's formula is: "Everything for the state, nothing outside the state, and nothing against the state." The American principle, as distinguished from the foreign philosophy, is that the state was created to serve the individuals and that the citizen is a sovereign crowned with the ballot and surrounded with certain inherent and inalienable rights which cannot be destroyed or abridged by the Government.

THE GREAT STRUGGLE

And so the titanic struggle in the United States is between American individualism on the one hand and European collectivism or state socialism on the other. American individualism does not mean the establishment of an industrial or financial feudalism controlled by a few men or interests. Such unrestrained individualism does not conform to the spirit of the American institutions of Government. There are some who construe American individualism to mean the concentration of wealth and power into the hands of a few. This is the European idea and never was American in origin or principle.

THE IMPORTANT QUESTION

The question is, Shall a few, whether that few be feudal lords under a system of concentrated ownership and control or a dictatorship under systems such as prevail in Russia and Italy, govern the masses or shall individual and political freedom be preserved? Shall American individualism, as proclaimed by Thomas Jefferson, applied by Andrew Jackson, and interpreted by Woodrow Wilson, be retained as the basis of our political, religious, and economic life, or shall we embrace the foreign philosophy of an enthroned and governing minority, whether that minority be the Communist of Russia, the Fascist of Italy, or the great industrial and financial lords who seek control of the wealth, natural resources, and the industrial power of the country?

NO MIDDLE GROUND

There is no middle ground or compromise. Either we are for or against America. If we are for America, we must be for the exclusion of new-seed immigrants and the deportation of those unlawfully here. If we are for America we are for those cardinal principles which are essentially American, such as liberty of speech, thought, and action consistent with the public weal, and the maintenance of a government that will be the servant of the people and not the master.

UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Those who are seeking to weaken our immigration, deportation, and naturalization laws by piecemeal legislation, such as removing the educational qualifications for citizenship, and even the obligation to defend their country in time of war, the legalizing of illegal entrants, the giving of discretionary power to the Secretary of Labor to deport or not to deport as she sees fit, the enlargement of nonquota classes, the nullification of the public-charge provision by the acceptance of worthless bonds, and all other such antirestriction measures which are now pending in Congress are working against the best interests of this country.

MOTIVES IMMATERIAL

The motives which actuate these various antirestriction blocs are immaterial and beside the question. The fact is that all of them—the internationalist, the sentimentalist, the greedy employer, or the steamship company seeking quick profits, and the aliens themselves and their relatives—are all working for the same results. Though actuated by different motives they have the same goal. They have hurled the challenge and thrown down the gauntlet.

THE OFFENSIVE IS ON

They are engaged in a great offensive. They secure hearings on their bills without any difficulty and get them reported out without delay. On the other hand, hearings are granted to us on restriction measures only during the closing days of the session, when it is too late to secure favorable action. Even when, after the greatest difficulty, we secure passage of restriction measures in the House, we cannot get a vote in the Senate as was illustrated by my two exclusion and deportation bills which passed the House in previous sessions only to die in the Senate for want of any active support.

WE ARE NOT LICKED

While we are on the defensive, we are not "licked." We shall continue to appeal to the American people until public sentiment is so thoroughly aroused and crystallized in this Nation that the majority of the people will demand immediate action. I am appealing to you my fellow countrymen to adopt the American slogan: America for Americans. The only way we can deport aliens is to deport them, and the only way to restrict immigration is to restrict it, and the only way to furnish employment to the idle American citizens is to give available jobs to American citizens before a single alien can be employed.

My friends, I regret that I cannot agree with Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, and with the Commissioner of Immigration, Mr. MacCormack, on this important question. Last year they sponsored two bills, H. R. 9725 and H. R. 9760, which were reported to the House by Representative DICKSTEIN, of New York, and in the Senate by Senator COOLIDGE, of Massachusetts, the respective Chairmen of the Immigration Committees of the two branches. The only one to come to an actual vote was H. R. 9725, which was defeated by a large majority. These bills were opposed by the American Federation of Labor, the Railroad Brotherhood, and patriotic societies in the United States. These bills would have given to the Secretary of Labor power to nullify the deportation laws and, to a large extent, immigration laws as well. An effort was made to jam these bills through Congress by saying they were administration bills. In fact, Mr. BYRNS, who was then the majority leader, stated on the floor of the House that the Secretary of Labor had called him to the telephone and asked him to say "that the President had expressed a very great interest and his very great desire to have all three of these immigration bills passed." In answer to Mr. BYRNS I stated that the President had not even seen the bills and that it was disclosed before our committee that the bills had not been approved by the President. I also called attention to the letter which the President wrote to Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, under date of December 8, 1933, which is as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. GREEN: I have referred your letter of September 22 to the Secretary of Labor and enclose a copy of the report submitted to me, which confirms my own understanding that there is no present proposal for relaxation of the restriction of immigration except such as have been made in favor of religious and political refugees.

"Very sincerely,

"(Signed) FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

Many restrictionists in this country do not believe that Madam Perkins is in sympathy with adequate restriction and expulsion of aliens. This wide-spread belief is expressed by W. C. Hushing, legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor, when he made the following statement before the committee when these bills were under consideration. Mr. Hushing said, "I think it would be especially unfortunate if she had this discretionary power, because I believe her leanings are toward the anti-restriction of immigration, and that is the opinion of the Federation."

Much of this belief is based upon the action of Secretary Perkins in reversing the order of her predecessor requiring that all immigrants be fingerprinted upon entry into the United States. Fingerprinting is the only practical known method by which the identity of an individual can be definitely established. This belief was also based upon her action in withholding the deportation of 1,200 aliens mandatorily deportable under existing statute and her effort to permit aliens or their relatives to execute bonds when they were rejected on the ground that they would likely become public charges. It is also based upon her action in admitting Emma Goldman, a notorious anarchist, and Henri Barbusse and Tom Mann, two persons whom the Department of Labor admits are Communists.

This belief was also strengthened by the opposition of the Labor Department to H. R. 4114, introduced by me, which proposed to reduce all quotas 60 percent and to apply the quota to the countries of the Western Hemisphere, and its opposition to the Schulte bill. This opposition was largely responsible for the committee's refusal to report these bills favorably, so that the House could have an opportunity to vote on them.

One cause for the doubt expressed by many restrictionists in regard to the leanings of the Secretary of Labor on this question is the fact that total deportations decreased from 19,865 in 1933 to 8,879 in 1934.

Statements from trustworthy sources have been frequently made that there are 100 alien-minded organizations in this country which are opposed to restriction. It is impossible to quote from the platforms and statements of these various organizations or to show how they are actively represented in Washington to weaken our immigration and deportation laws.

One leading antirestrictionist Congressman expressed in an address at one of their conferences the new strategy in the following language: "From my experiences I have discovered that the best attack lies in the relatives' relief proposals."

To illustrate the high-powered and well-financed propaganda and activities of the alien blocs in seeking to influence American legislation, I refer you to the letter dated June 5, 1935, of the American branch of the International Migration Service. This alien organization has its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland, with branch offices in the United States, France, Germany, Greece, and Poland. It numbers among its vice presidents such aliens as Jania Chlapowska, Inazo Nitobe, George Paspati. The letter is addressed to all cooperating agencies and urges them to write Congressmen and Senators and to get favorable material in local newspapers in behalf of the Kerr bill. The Kerr bill is the culmination of many years of planning and efforts to weaken our restriction and deportation laws, and is not in the interest of the native-born and naturalized American citizens or the aliens who are lawfully in this country and who desire to become American citizens. The Kerr bill is substantially the same as the Dickstein bill which was defeated last Congress by a majority of more than two to one.

So while I regret the necessity to take opposite sides with the Democratic appointee, Secretary Perkins, I am compelled by my convictions to do so, even though there are those who accuse me of not being in sympathy with the Democratic administration.

In conclusion, permit me to summarize the facts and the proposed remedies.

Do you know that—

One-third of our population is foreign stock?

Our unemployment problem was transferred to America from foreign shores, and if the 16,500,000 foreign born in this country today had been refused admission there would be no serious unemployment problem confronting our Nation today?

There are 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully in this country according to my estimates, as many people as we propose to put to work by the expenditure of the $4,000,000,000 public-works funds recently appropriated by Congress, and that these aliens can be promptly deported by adequate legislation and vigorous enforcement?

There are from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 aliens on public relief who should be deported?

There are 6,000,000 aliens deriving their livelihood from jobs which Americans should hold and would hold if we had the same laws that are in force in other enlightened countries?

If we gave the jobs that are held by aliens to American citizens, the unemployment problem would be largely solved.

The Dies bill and proposal have the following provisions:

(1) Permanently stop all new-seed immigration from every country.

(2) Deport all aliens unlawfully in the United States, including alien Communists, dope peddlers, gangsters, racketeers, criminals, and other undesirables.

(3) Deport all aliens legally here who fail to become American citizens within a reasonable time.

(4) Gradually reunite families where the admitted relative is not likely to become a public charge or to take some job away from an American citizen.

(5) Register and fingerprint all aliens in the United States.

(6) Require every alien to secure from the Department of Labor a permit to work before he can hold any job, with the provision that permits to work will be denied to any alien so long as there is an American citizen able and willing to do the work.

ALGENE KEY AND FRED KEY

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, down in the grand old Magnolia State of Mississippi today there drones beneath the softness of a southern sun the handiwork of science, an airplane. In this destiny ship, Mr. Speaker, and controlling its mechanisms are two intrepid and noble sons of that State—Fred and Algene Key, sons of Dr. and Mrs. E. B. Key, of Meridian, Miss. To date, Mr. Speaker, these loyal sons of the South have been aloft, refueling by the light of day and the dark of night, for about 534 hours, or something like 22 days; they have only about 30 hours to go, Mr. Speaker, before they will be acclaimed the new title holders of the refueling record of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I have been personally associated with these boys most of their lives, and their present endeavors are but another signal of what I have always known about them, and that is the desire to conquer in a way that will materially aid science. Their own mechanic, their own friend with his ship as the refueling agent, their initiative and fortitude, and the kindness of Providence, together with a ship they rebuilt themselves, is alone responsible for the great number of hours they have already attained.

ANALYSIS OF EFFECTS OF SECTION 11, TITLE I, OF THE PUBLIC UTILITY BILL (S. 2796) ON PRINCIPAL ELECTRIC UTILITY HOLDING AND OPERATING COMPANIES

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the holding-company bill and to include two tables which I have had prepared.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on tomorrow we take up the discussion of the utilities holding-company bill. In order to assist the Members as much as possible in arriving at the facts touching the questions involved, I want to analyze briefly the effects of section 11, title I, of the bill, and under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert at the end of my remarks some tables which I have had prepared and which I am sure will be of vital interest to every Member of the House.

Spokesmen for the holding companies center their attack on the public-utility bill on the alleged disastrous effects of what they term the "death sentence" in section 11 of the Senate bill. They have offered no evidence in support of their claims regarding this section, but have made sweeping assertions that it will have disastrous effects on the electrical industry, the consumers of electrical energy, and the investors in electrical securities.

Analysis of the actual effects of the provisions of section 11 on the principal electric-utility holding and operating companies demonstrates conclusively that these charges are unfounded. This analysis shows that the greater part of the properties represented by the principal holding and operating companies will either be completely exempt from the provisions of section 11 or can meet its requirements by a simple plan of reorganization.

A survey of the 43 largest electric-utility holding and operating companies in the United States, controlling more than 90 percent of the fixed assets of all electric utilities, discloses the following facts:

First. A group of 19 large holding and operating companies with fixed capital assets of more than $5,000,000,000 ($5,219,533,921) are completely exempt from the provisions of section 11 because their properties are entirely within a single State or are a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system. This group of companies represents more than one-third of the electrical industry. It includes such great systems as Commonwealth Edison, Consolidated Gas of New York, Detroit Edison, Duke Power, Boston Edison, Hartford Electric, Niagara Hudson, Pacific Gas & Electric, Pacific Lighting, Public Service of New Jersey, Southern California Edison, and Tampa Electric.

A list of these companies with a statement of their fixed capital assets is set forth in table I.

Second. A second group of 13 large holding companies, with fixed capital assets of more than $5,000,000,000 ($5,338,580,699) will be able to meet the provisions of section 11 either by such interconnection and coordinated operation as will convert their properties into a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system or by a simple plan of reorganization.

For example, the properties of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation consist essentially of two groups, one located in the Southeastern States, the other in Michigan. Before the creation of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation in 1929, the Southeastern properties were controlled by Southeastern Power & Light and operated as an independent system. The Michigan properties were controlled by Consumers Power Co. By returning to the plan of organization in effect before 1929 these properties can be economically and efficiently operated without any loss whatever to any investor.

Other holding companies in this group have a larger number of properties, but they are capable of coming within the provisions of section 11 by a relatively simple plan of reorganization.

This group includes such outstanding holding companies as American Electric Power Corporation, American Gas & Electric, American Power & Light, American Water Works & Electric, Columbia Gas & Electric, Commonwealth & Southern, Electric Light & Power, International Hydro Electric, Midland United, National Power & Light, and United Gas Improvement.

This group includes all of the subsidiary holding companies of the Electric Bond & Share Co. and also its affiliate, the American Gas & Electric Co. Inasmuch as these subsidiary holding companies control the fixed-capital assets of the group, the Electric Bond & Share Co. is not shown separately. Its subsidiary, American & Foreign Power Co., whose properties are located entirely outside of the United States, does not come under the provisions of section 11 of the bill.

Third. A third group of 11 large holding companies, which control widely scattered properties or are highly pyramided, must be completely reorganized to come within the provisions of section 11. This group, which has smaller fixed-capital assets—$5,115,437,545—than either of the other groups outlined above, includes primarily those holding companies which were piled one on top of the other by financiers and promoters during the stock-market boom.

This group includes Associated Gas & Electric, Cities Service, Middle West Utilities, Standard Power & Light, Stone & Webster, and Utilities Power & Light.

It should be noted that the fixed-capital assets of these holding companies comprise not only electric properties but also gas, water, street-railway, and other properties. The total fixed-capital assets are, therefore, considerably in excess of the claimed investment in electric properties alone, estimated by the Edison Electric Institute at $13,000,000,000 for 1933.

SUITS BY HOLDERS OF GOLD-CLAUSE BONDS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Before the termination of this session of the Congress I believe that it is important that definite action be taken to eliminate any uncertainty with respect to the right of holders of gold-clause bonds of the Government to sue for payment, either in gold or else in legal tender, with an additional sum of 69 cents on every dollar.

To this end I urge the withdrawal by the United States of its consent to be sued upon its currency or securities. The question of the effect of the so-called "gold clause", in the light of the monetary legislation of the Seventy-third Congress, came before the Supreme Court at the term just closed. A suit for additional payment under existing circumstances, the Court said, would "constitute not a recoupment of loss in any proper sense but an unjustified enrichment." Bonds of the United States containing gold clauses—all of them issued, sold, and payable wholly within the United States—have been continuously quoted on the exchanges at no higher prices than bonds not containing such clauses. But the continuing possibility of actions by litigious persons leaves open the continuing possibility of speculation. There is no public interest, under these conditions, in permitting a handful of private litigants to exploit the general public in the hope of a wholly speculative private profit.

This conclusion will hold so long as the Congress adheres to its declared policy, now more than a third of a century old, to maintain the equal value of every dollar in the market.

I recommend, therefore, the enactment of legislation which will make clear that it is our fixed policy to continue to treat the bondholders of all our securities equally and uniformly, to afford any holder of any gold-clause security who thinks he could by any possibility sustain any loss in the future an opportunity to put himself immediately in a position to avoid such future loss, and to remove all possibility of any suits designed to hamper the Government in administering the public debt and in financing its ordinary and emergency expenditures.

More specifically, I recommend the immediate enactment of legislation (1) that will authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of the holders of gold-clause securities of the United States, to make payment therefor in cash, dollar for dollar, with accrued interest, or, at the holder's election, to exchange such securities for non-gold-clause securities with the same interest rate and maturity; (2) that will terminate any consent which the United States may have voluntarily given to be sued on its securities, coins, or currencies; and (3) that will reaffirm the fixed policy of the United States to make payment to all holders of its securities, coins, and currencies on an equal and uniform dollar-for-dollar basis and will make appropriations available for payments on this basis and on this basis only.

There is no constitutional or inherent right to sue the Government; on the contrary, the immunity of the sovereign from suit is a principle of universal acceptance, and permission to bring such suits is an act of grace which with us may be granted or withheld by the Congress. The courts, it is hardly necessary for me to add, will always be open to those who seek justice; but they were not established for use by a few to enrich themselves at the expense of the many, nor to enable a few to harass and embarrass sovereign action by the Government when taken for the benefit of all.

Not only justice to the holders of our currency and of our securities, who support and rely on our policy of equal and uniform treatment to all, but also the interests of our entire people require that the Government of the United States make it clear that it cannot and will not consent to the use of its courts in aid of efforts to sabotage the operations of Government or in aid of private speculation.

This proposal reasserts and makes definite the control of the Congress over the securities and money issued by the United States of America.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 27, 1935.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from the executive board of the Newark (N. J.) Branch, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, signed by Robert H. Wheeler, vice president, praying for the prompt enactment of the so-called "Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Frank White, of Atlanta, Ga., praying for the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BONE presented the petition of the West Seattle (Wash.) Townsend Old-Age Revolving Pension Club, praying for the enactment into law of the so-called "Townsend old-age-pension plan", which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McADOO presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

CHAPTER 139

Assembly Joint Resolution No. 22—Relative to Pacific Exposition

Whereas Pacific Exposition, an international exposition, is to be held in the county of Los Angeles, State of California, during 1937–38, and thereafter, for the purpose of commemorating the completion of Boulder Dam and the power and water developments and projects thereof: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, That we, the representatives of the people of the State of California, do hereby respectfully request the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to cause an invitation to be extended to the peoples of the world to participate in said exposition; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, to the Congress of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress.

REGULATION OF PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. WHEELER presented a paper from the Hartford (Conn.) Central Labor Union, relative to the so-called "Wheeler-Rayburn public utilities bill", which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARTFORD CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
Hartford, Conn.

Reply to Samuel Ferguson on the Wheeler-Rayburn bill

The following was unanimously adopted at a meeting June 19, 1935, at the Labor Temple Hall:

Voted: That the Hartford Central Labor Union send a copy of the following statement to President Roosevelt, Senators MALONEY, WHEELER, BLACK, BORAH, and also to Congressmen KOPPLEMANN, CITRON, RAYBURN, chairman of committee, and other proponents.

According to the press, June 12, "Mr. Samuel Ferguson, chairman of the board of the Hartford Electric Light and Connecticut Power Cos., dispatched Senator LONERGAN as follows":

"Twelve thousand stockholders and 50,000 customers of this company are grateful to you for your efforts to modify or defeat the destructive Wheeler-Rayburn bill."

This bill passed in the Senate by a vote of 56 in favor to 32 against, and several Senators, in urging the passage of the bill, stated in the debate that the only thing it would prove destructive of would be, using their own language, "fraud", "chicanery", "bloodsuckers", "thieves" "racketeers", and "pyramiding of unnecessary holding companies."

Several Senators, opposing its passage, admitted most flagrant abuses by several holding companies, as have also practically all the leading newspapers, Republican and Democratic, stating editorially, "By their utter disregard of the rules of honesty and decency in their business transactions or the interests of the people they brought this trouble upon themselves", etc.

But what the Central Labor Union is anxious to know is, since when, and by whom, was Mr. Ferguson authorized to act as official spokesman for the "50,000 customers", on matters of pending controversial legislation in Congress? The purpose of which is, in this case, the protection of the welfare of the masses as against the interests of the privileged few. "Fifty thousand grateful customers" mass production do you ask? Yes; of nerve, a natural tendency of monopoly.

Representing a large number of customers, not by choice, but because of its being a monopoly we have no other alternative, several thousand of which customers have for years been strenuously protesting, through the press and otherwise, against what they consider to be unfair charges, and we hereby protest against being included among the so-called "50,000 grateful customers", and we further protest against any person assuming the right to register us as favoring or opposed to any pending legislation in Washington or elsewhere without our consent.

It is the opinion of the Central Labor Union that it would be about as logical and much nearer the truth if the Hartford Courant or the Hartford Times sent a dispatch to Senator MALONEY stating 50,000 customers, readers of this paper are grateful to you for your efforts to pass the constructive Wheeler-Rayburn bill, and your vote against the destructive Dieterich amendment.

Voted: That the Central Labor Union send a vote of thanks to Senator MALONEY for his loyal support of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill.

JAMES T. MANEE, Secretary.

PROCESSING TAXES—STATEMENT BY SENATOR METCALF

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement issued by the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] appearing in the Providence Journal of June 24, 1935, relative to section 29 of House bill 8492, containing provisions relating to suits regarding processing taxes.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Providence Journal, June 24, 1935]

RE H. R. 8492, SECTION 29, CONTAINING PROVISIONS RELATING TO SUITS REGARDING PROCESSING TAXES

It is astonishing that the Congress will even consider amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act which are so radical and far-reaching as to prevent a taxpayer from recovering money illegally and unconstitutionally collected by the processing tax. Not only do these amendments nullify the constitutional rights of a citizen but they deprive him of all redress from any illegal acts which may be committed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Apparently fearing that the tax might be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, after its recent decisions declaring certain of the new-deal measures to be invalid, the administration has sought through section 29 of this bill, first, to prevent taxpayers from securing refunds of taxes previously paid or assessed and, secondly, to enable the Government to collect and retain taxes subsequently assessed, even though they might be illegal.

The bill, in paragraph (a) of section 21, seeks to accomplish the first objective by providing that no suit shall be brought or maintained in the courts for a refund of any taxes previously paid.

The second objective, which is to enable the Government to collect and keep taxes assessed in the future, the bill seeks to accomplish, first, by denying to the taxpayer the right prior to payment of the tax to secure a decision by the courts as to its validity, and, secondly, by imposing conditions upon the taxpayer's right to secure a refund after the tax is paid, which, as a practical matter, will in the vast majority of cases be impossible of fulfillment. In carrying out this purpose the bill goes so far as to declare that a taxpayer shall not be permitted to obtain a declaratory judgment under the Federal Declaratory Judgments Act passed by Congress in June 1934, which was hailed at the time as a much-needed measure to promote the administration of justice.

Under paragraph (d), the taxpayer, in order to obtain a refund of taxes paid subsequently to the adoption of the amendment, (1) must prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he has not passed on the tax as a part of the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed, or of any article processed from the commodity with respect to which it was imposed, or (2) he must file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the written consent of the ultimate purchaser to the allowance of the refund.

It is manifest that in the great majority of cases it will be impossible for the taxpayer to comply with these conditions. The fact, for example, that the processor may have lost during the year a sum equal to or greater than the amount of the taxes paid does not constitute proof that the taxes, or any particular part of them, were not passed on. The loss is attributable to the fact that he has not recovered from his customers the full amount of his costs, which consist not merely of the processing tax but also of sums paid for raw materials, wages, and overhead and other expenses. Furthermore, it will oftentimes be equally impossible to comply with the second condition that the written consent of the ultimate purchaser to the allowance of a refund be obtained. In many instances it will be a hopeless task to trace to the ultimate consumer the goods with respect to which the taxes have been paid. To impose such conditions on recovery is to deny the right to refund.

It is obvious that these provisions constitute an attempt to circumvent the Constitution and to enable the Government to continue the collection of a tax which may well be illegal, without any opportunity on the part of the taxpayer to resist collection or to secure a refund after the tax is paid. If the attempt is successful, there is no reason why the same thing could not be done with respect to income taxes, excess-profits taxes, capital-stock taxes, and excise taxes generally, in fact, with respect to every tax assessed on business.

Suppose, for example, that the refund of income taxes improperly collected were made conditional upon the taxpayer proving that the tax had not passed on as a part of the price of the goods sold by him, is it not clear that he would in fact be denied the right to a refund?

These provisions of the bill constitute but another example of the length to which the present administration will go to accomplish its purposes. The administration secured the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act and for 2 years successfully resisted all attempts to obtain a decision by the United States Supreme Court as to its validity, and even went so far as to withdraw its appeal to that court in the Belcher case in order that the N. R. A. might have a further lease of life. As a result of wide-spread popular protest against such action, however, the administration reluctantly consented to have the Schechter case argued at this term of court with the result that the act was held to be unconstitutional by a unanimous decision.

Moreover, the attempt in the first paragraph of section 21 to deprive the taxpayer of every remedy to secure a refund of processing taxes previously paid is but a bare-faced repudiation of a Government obligation, in no way to be distinguished from the repudiation of a Government bond or other obligation. The comments of the House Committee on Agriculture in its report on this paragraph are most interesting. On page 20 the report says:

"The practical effect of this provision will be to prevent any refunds of taxes already collected upon the ground that the act or the actions of the Secretary thereunder are illegal. The justification for such a provision denying refunds is found in the fact that the taxes paid have been passed on to the consumer. The constitutional basis for such a provision is found in the power of the United States at any time to assert its sovereign right not to be sued." (Italics mine.)

It may fairly be asked: Is Congress omniscient that it is thus able to determine that the taxes paid have in all cases been passed on to the consumer? Those cotton mills that have lost hundreds of thousands of dollars during the past 2 years since the A. A. A. was enacted will doubtless be somewhat surprised at this arbitrary finding of fact without investigation.

The issue here involved is not the narrow question of whether or not the taxpayer should be deprived of all remedies with respect to the processing tax, but whether the Federal Government should be permitted to collect from the citizens of the country, in the guise of taxes, and retain as its own without remedy on the part of the taxpayer, money which it may have no lawful right to collect. If this can be done, property in unlimited amount can be taken from our citizens without regard to constitutional limitations and devoted to such purposes as the Federal Government may, in its absolute discretion, see fit. It should be no answer to say in any case that the burden of the tax has been passed on to another, particularly where the tax has not in express terms been so transferred.

The question is one between the Government and the person who paid the tax, and if the tax was improperly collected the money should be returned to the person paying it. Whether he should be permitted to keep it or should be required to pay the whole or part of the sum refunded to someone else is an entirely separate and independent question. Should it be desired, as a means of protecting third persons who may have an interest in the refund, to permit them to intervene in any tax suit brought to secure such refund, this, of course, would be entirely proper and unobjectionable; but the Government should not be permitted to retain a tax illegally collected on the mere ground that it is not clear whether the person who paid the tax, if he recovers it, will be required to share the refund with someone else.

I do not wish to be understood as asserting that the processing tax is unconstitutional, although it is the opinion of competent attorneys that the tax is invalid. I merely wish to point out that if the tax is constitutional the provisions of section 21 are wholly unnecessary, and if the tax is not constitutional they constitute a flagrant attempt on the part of the Federal Government to deprive the taxpayer of his just rights.

In the case of the processing tax the Government is acting as an intermediary for the transfer of money from one person to another. Is this a true tax for the general welfare, or is the Government unconstitutionally acting as a collecting and disbursing agency? If it is a true tax, the funds should be used for the general good instead of benefits for a specific group, and if the converse is true the tax is obviously unconstitutional.

This, then, is the administration's answer to the urgent appeal of the cotton-textile industry for relief from the processing tax. The tax is to be continued, even though unconstitutional.

MOCKERY IN TAXATION—EDITORIAL IN THE BALTIMORE SUN

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mockery in Taxation", which appears in the Baltimore Sun of this morning.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, June 27, 1935]

Viewed from any important angle, the administration's tax program, as described in the Washington dispatches, can be regarded only as a shallow mockery.

Yesterday the Sun had occasion to say that the central question in the tax program that has been discussed, since the President's message to Congress 1 week ago today, was whether the purpose was to impose punitive taxes or to lay new taxes for the purpose of putting the Treasury on a sound basis. If the purpose was merely to punish, the program, in our opinion, should be stubbornly opposed. If the purpose was to move toward a balanced Budget, the program, in our opinion, should be warmly supported, for it is by no means too early to lay the taxes which must be paid to cover our stupendous expenditures, unless we are to risk ultimate repudiation of the Government's debts. The rich must be prepared to pay more, the well-to-do must be prepared to pay more, and so must the so-called "small man."

They all will pay, and pay through the nose, if vast spending goes on without adequate taxing until it comes to an end in a collapse of the national credit and in repudiation of the Government's debts. That will be taxation for all, and no legerdemain of bookkeeping will save either the rich man or the well-to-do man, and certainly it will not save the poor man.

It is now apparent that the administration's program is utterly trivial, utterly negligible, as a step toward a balanced Budget. In the fiscal year drawing to a close we had spent up to last Monday $7,190,586,468.76. Our deficit last Monday was $3,422,948,294.80. As against that deficit, the $340,000,000 provided in the present tax program is but a drop in the bucket. It is something short of one-tenth of this year's deficit. And, since there is no sign whatever that the administration proposes to reduce its expenditures in the next fiscal year, the new taxes can be expected to make no more impression upon the 1936 deficit. Moreover, as a popular rein upon expenditures the new taxes will be useless. They affect only a handful of people who, in most cases, lack any public or political influence.

Such is the fruit of the administration's work from the standpoint of those who believe that the gathering of a substantial income is not a crime which must be taxed to death, and that the possession of a substantial estate is not a menace which must be taxed to death, but who also believe that new taxes must be laid, and sternly laid, to protect the Treasury and the Government's debts. From the standpoint of those who are devoted to the theory of redistribution of wealth, the administration's program is equally a mockery.

This $340,000,000, what does it amount to? Wealth is to be redistributed by the Government taking money from the rich and using it either to relieve the tax load of the many or to pay benefits to the many. But if we figure roughly on a per capita basis, this $340,000,000 comes to the average redistribution of $2.70 annually among the 126,000,000 persons in this country. If, to give another rough illustration of the value of this $340,000,000 as a redistribution of wealth, we set it against the estimated national income of sixty billion, we get a figure of less than three-fifths of 1 percent. In other words, under this ballyhooed $340,000,000 tax program, Mr. Roosevelt is redistributing less than 6 mills out of every dollar of the estimated current national income.

The Sun submits that this is a cheap performance, which even the President's critics would not have cared to anticipate. From the fallacious standpoint of the redistributors of wealth, it is child's play, even as it is inadequate and trifling from the standpoint of those who favor straightforward taxation, up and down the scale, in the interest of a sound Budget and of sound Government debts. For a solid week there has been an immense commotion, led by the President of the United States himself, and at the end of a week there is a program no man can respect. It is time for President Roosevelt to enter his closet for meditation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTIONS IN MEXICO—PRECEDENTS FOR FEDERAL ACTION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of the memorandum of the National Committee for the Defense of American Rights in Mexico presented in support of Senate Resolution 70, submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], authorizing a Senatorial investigation of the religious persecutions in Mexico.

This memorandum or brief enumerates international-law precedents, legislative precedents, and executive-department precedents in support of the resolution. These precedents present an interesting, historic, and formidable background of the position taken by the United States Government at various periods in the past in regard to racial and religious persecutions in foreign countries.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRECEDENTS V

There are ample legal precedents to warrant favorable action on the Borah resolution. The principal foundation for such precedents is common justice to humanity and the inherent rights all civilized beings have for protection against an unjust discrimination of their liberty and freedom.

The precedents are hereinafter referred to in the following order:

1. International law.
2. Legislative
3. Executive departments.
   (a) Pertaining to American citizens.
   (b) Pertaining to aliens.

1. INTERNATIONAL LAW

The following is an abstract of some of the principles of international law relating to protection of the right of religious worship by aliens, as pointed out by Hon. Martin T. Manton, judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Southern District of New York, in a booklet recently published by him and entitled "Religious Prohibitions Under the Mexican Constitution."

Alien residents in a country are subjected to the civil and municipal laws of that country and amenable thereto, but such aliens possess equal rights with native citizens.

The state, however, has a right to expel from its territory any obnoxious foreigners for reason of public order or security. But, even though it cannot be proved that the teachings of the Christian churches of Mexico are opposed to public policy, practically all of the Christian churches have been closed, or confiscated, many thousands of their ministers have been expelled, and in other cases murdered. These acts on the part of the Mexican officials are carried out even in the face of the guaranty of freedom of religious worship given by article 24 of the Mexican Constitution of 1917 as follows:

"Every man is free to profess the religion of his choice and to practice the rituals, devotions, or acts of the respective creeds, in the temples or in his home, provided they do not constitute a crime or offense punishable by law."

If it should be proved that certain members of the clergy are engaged in activities of a seditious character, the Government of Mexico might deal with such members accordingly. This, however, does not give it the right to seize all of the churches and schools, expel the clergy, and force atheistic teachings on its citizens and the citizens of other countries who happen to reside there.

This principle was settled by Chief Justice Marshall in his decision in the case of The Charming Betsy (2 Cranch U. S., 64 (1804)), where he said:

"The American citizen who goes into a foreign country, although he owes local and temporary allegience to that country, is yet, if he performs no other act changing his condition, entitled to the protection of his own government; and if, without the violation of any municipal law, he should be oppressed unjustly, he would have a right to claim that protection, and the interposition of the American Government in his favor would be considered as a justifiable interposition."

This duty extends to moral persons, as well as natural persons. In the former class are included churches, schools, and religious associations. Moral persons or entities are regulated by the law of the country in which they were created. Mexican statute law, article 5 of the naturalization law of May 28, 1886, provides: "* * * nationality of moral persons or entities is regulated by the law authorizing their creation." The fact is that many of the church institutions in Mexico are of foreign origin. Therefore, under this principle, they are entitled to enjoy the same privileges accorded them in the country where they were organized. They should be permitted the privilege and right to buy, sell, and own property, which privilege has been taken from them and their property confiscated without just compensation. Furthermore, they have a right to peacefully conduct religious services and teaching, which has also been taken away.

Mr. Justice Harlan in Berea College v. Kentucky (221 U. S. 45 (1908)), said:

"The capacity to impart instruction to others is given by the Almighty for beneficent purposes; and its use may not be forbidden or interfered with by the government. * * * The right to impart instruction, harmless in itself or beneficial to those who receive it, is a substantial right of property." * * *

The facts will show that the life, liberty, and property of the Christian church of Mexico is being impaired. The church, therefore, has a right to be protected from such abuses.

Mexico, in article 27, destroyed all right of private ownership of property:

Religious associations called churches, whatever their creed, shall in no case have the capacity to acquire possession, or administer real property.

All church property is transferred to the nation. A limited right of ownership is recognized but it cannot be "under the patronage, control, administration, charge, or supervision of religious corporations or institutions, nor of ministers of the creeds or of their dependents, even when the latter or the former are not in active service."

Citing Oppenheim, I, International Law (3d ed., 1920), 462, in saying the substance of international law consists of the ethical and moral principles of the Christian religion, Manton says:

"* * * Wholesale expulsion of the agents of religion on capricious or ill-founded grounds is clearly a violation of the rights of men, aliens and citizens alike, and of the church, guaranteed by modern international law."

The principle of religious equality has been incorporated in many treaties between foreign countries as a principle of international law, and on many occasions our own country, as well as others, have taken definite action to protect violations of the fundamental right of religious freedom.

On page 16 of his treatise Judge Manton says:

"* * * Religious instruction is condemned in Mexico, not because of the violation of any law, nor because it is a menace to the peace and security of the state, but because, as the commission—which reported on article 3 to the constitutional assembly—put it: Such teaching contributes 'to deform the natural psychological growth of the child and tends to produce a certain deformity of his spirit.' This is a strange doctrine, completely at variance with 2,000 years of Christian instruction and the accumulated experience of countless millions who have felt the beneficent effects of that instruction." * * *

In speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Davis v. Beason (133 U. S. 333), Mr. Justice Field said:

"The first amendment to the Constitution, in declaring that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or forbidding the free exercise thereof, was intended to allow everyone under the jurisdiction of the United States to entertain such notions respecting his relations to his Maker, and the duties they impose as may be approved by his judgment and conscience, and to exhibit his sentiments in such form of worship as he may think proper, nor injurious to the equal rights of others, and to prohibit legislation for the support of any religious tenets, or the modes of worship of any sect." (Italics ours.)

The inhibitions established by the present Mexican Government against religion are set forth in the treatise of Judge Manton as follows:

"(a) Forbidden to conduct schools for primary education.

"(b) Monastic orders prohibited.

"(c) Loss of citizenship for any believer who agrees before a clergyman not to obey the constitution and laws.

"(d) Public worship, where tolerated, must be conducted under official supervision.

"(e) Nationalization of church property.

"(f) Church incapacitated to hold property.

"(g) Church forbidden to conduct or supervise beneficent associations.

"(h) Priests forbidden to visit schools, under penalty of closing the schools.

"(i) Juristic personality of the churches has been destroyed.

"(j) Limitation of the number of priests by individual States.

"(k) Priests forbidden to criticize the constitution, the laws, the authorities, and the government.

"(l) Religious publications forbidden to comment on political questions.

"(m) Priests must be Mexican nationals.

"(n) Political organizations with religious names forbidden.

"(o) Priests forbidden to inherit, directly or indirectly, from another priest or some stranger.

"(p) Priests withdrawn, even in matters relating exclusively to their sacred calling, from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

"(q) Churches closed and priests persecuted, expelled, and in countless cases, executed. In other words, the church has ceased to exist in Mexico as a spiritual and social force."

With regard to these, Judge Manton says:

"Are the questions under the constitution of 1917 of no concern to other nations than Mexico? Can these glaring abuses against the traditional religion of the Mexican people be justified merely because they are sanctioned by the constitution? Certainly not. In the international order of things, the rights of foreign persons, whether natural or moral, and the rights of humanity cannot be violated with impunity by any municipal law." * * *

Practically every civilized nation, at one time or another, has intervened in the internal affairs of another nation solely in the interest of humanity, and such action has universally been recognized as consistent with the principles of international law.

Wheaton, I, Elements of International Law (6th English ed. 1929), pp. 172–173, says:

"The interference of the Christian powers of Europe, in favor of the Greeks, who, after enduring ages of cruel oppression, had shaken off the Ottoman yoke, affords a further illustration of the principles of international law authorizing such an interference, not only where the interests and safety of other powers are immediately affected by the internal transactions of a particular state, but where the general interests of humanity are infringed by the excesses of a barbarous and despotic government." (Italics ours.)

Oppenheim, I, International Law (3d ed., 1920), page 462, says:

"* * * There is no doubt that should a state venture to treat its own subjects or some of them with such cruelty as would stagger humanity public opinion of the rest of the world would call upon the powers to exercise intervention for the purpose of compelling such state to establish a legal order of things within its boundaries sufficient to guarantee to its citizens an existence more adequate to the ideas of modern civilization."

Sir Robert Phillimore, a member of the British Privy Council and judge of the High Court of Admiralty, questions that any action taken by one state against another for religious grounds can be called intervention when he says:

"The practice (if it can be called such) of intervention of one Christian state on behalf of the subjects of another Christian state upon the ground of religion dates from the period of the Reformation. It could scarcely, indeed, have had an earlier origin. The abstract principle of this kind of intervention has derived positive force from being embodied in various important treaties" (Rub. 621–22, Rub. CCCCXI).

And we might go on quoting from many other treatises on international law as supporting this principle. Indeed it is difficult, if not impossible, to find any recognized authority opposed to the fundamental principle of the right of one country to intervene and protect the citizens of another country, who are being oppressed as a religious class.

On page 25 of his treatise Judge Manton gives the following as the international rights of man:

"1. The right of personal liberty.

"2. The right of property.

"3. The right to exercise at all times the civil rights, providing the same are not contrary to the public law of the state.

"The right to exercise his religious faith."

We need only to refer to the outline of the inhibitions established against religions, as stated above, to determine whether international rights have been impaired in Mexico to an extent warranting intervention on the part of our Government. The fate of the church in Mexico as thus given by Judge Manton is not merely a supposition, but it is supported by facts in evidentiary form; as will be shown later on in this memorandum.

Conditions of United States recognition in 1915

In the past the American Government has concerned itself with the religious situation in Mexico. In 1915 one of the conditions of recognition of the Carranza government was a promise that the Mexican Government would respect every person's life, property, and religious beliefs; and in 1921 our Government submitted to Mexico a proposed treaty in which it was provided that the nationals of either party were not to be "disturbed, molested, or annoyed in any manner on account of their religious beliefs, nor in the proper exercise of their respective creeds, whether in their homes or in their churches or chapels (cf. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Apr. 25, 1935, pp. 6431–6432).

2. LEGISLATIVE

Irish political prisoners

On July 29, 1916, the following substitute resolution, offered by Senator PITTMAN (S. Res. 241), was adopted by the United States Senate:

"Resolved, That the Senate expresses the hope that the British Government may exercise clemency in the treatment of Irish political prisoners; and that the President be requested to transmit this resolution to that Government."

Irish independence

On May 29, 1919, Senator BORAH submitted a resolution (S. Res. 48) from the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was adopted in the following form by the Senate, the second resolve being offered by Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, and approved by the Senate:

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States earnestly requests the American Peace Commission at Versailles to endeavor to secure for Edward De Valera, Arthur Griffiths, and Count George Noble Plunkett, a hearing before said peace conference in order that they may present the cause of Ireland.

"Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States express its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a Government of their own choice. (Walsh amendment.)"

Persecutions of Jews in the Ukraine

On December 12, 1919, the following resolution (S. Res. 259), offered by Senator Spencer, was reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations and agreed to with amendments offered:

Resolved, That the attention of the Senate having been called to the reported massacre of members of the Jewish race in the Ukraine and to the existence and execution of pogroms, which indicate a determination to exterminate the Jews of Ukraine, it is requested of the State Department that such information as may be available, not inconsistent with the public interest, be transmitted to the Senate showing the actual conditions in the Ukraine.

Termination of Treaty of 1832 between the United States and Russia

The following is House Joint Resolution 166, introduced in 1911 which resulted in the following letter from President Taft to the Senate of the United States dated December 18, 1911, which follows:

"Resolved, etc., That the people of the United States assert as a fundamental principle that the rights of its citizens shall not be impaired at home or abroad because of race or religion; that the Government of the United States concludes its treaties for the equal protection of all classes of its citizens, without regard to race or religion; that the Government of the United States will not be a party to any treaty which discriminates, or which by one of the parties thereto is so construed as to discriminate, between American citizens on the ground of race or religion; that the Government of Russia has violated the treaty between the United States and Russia, concluded at St. Petersburg, December 18, 1832, refusing to honor American passports duly issued to American citizens on account of race and religion; that in the judgment of the Congress the said treaty, for the reasons aforesaid, ought to be terminated at the earliest possible time; that for the aforesaid reasons the said treaty is hereby declared to be terminated and of no further force and effect from the expiration of 1 year after the date of notification to the Government of Russia of the terms of this resolution, and that to this end the President is hereby charged with the duty of communicating such notice to the Government of Russia."

President Taft's letter

"By instructions which I caused the Secretary of State to transmit to the American Ambassador at St. Petersburg on the 15th day of December 1911, there was given to the Imperial Russian Government, under the date of the 17th day of December 1911, official notification, on behalf of this Government, of intention to terminate the operation of the treaty of commerce and navigation of December 18, 1832, between the United States and Russia upon the expiration of the year commencing on the 1st day of January 1912.

Investigation of outrages upon citizens of the United States in Mexico

On August 8, 1919, a Senate resolution (S. Res. 106), introduced by Senator Fall, was adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the matter of damages and outrages suffered by citizens of the United States in the Republic of Mexico, including the number of citizens of the United States who have been killed or have suffered personal outrages in Mexico, and the amount of proper indemnities for such murders and outrages; the quantity of damages suffered on account of the destruction, confiscation, and larceny of personal property and the confiscation and deprivation of the use of lands and the destruction of improvements thereon; the number of citizens of the United States residing in Mexico at the time Porfirio Diaz retired from the Presidency of Mexico, and the number of citizens of the United States at present residing in Mexico, and the nature and amount of their present holdings and properties in said country; and in general any and all acts of the Government of Mexico and its citizens in derogation of the rights of the United States or of its citizens; and for this purpose to sit at any time or place during the sessions of Congress or during recess and with authority to subpena such witnesses and documents as may be necessary, and to make a report of its findings in the premises to the Senate; and the said committee shall further investigate and report to the Senate what, if any, measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence of such outrages."

The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate conducted an extensive hearing from Monday, September 8, 1919, to Thursday, May 20, 1920, which was contained in two volumes know as "Investigation of Mexican Affairs" (Document No. 285, 66th Cong., 2d sess.). This investigation resulted in the creation of the United States-Mexican Mixed Claims Commission.

Expression of senatorial protests against persecution of Jews in Germany

On June 10, 1933, eight Senators led by the floor leader of the majority party, Senator ROBINSON, raised their voice in opposition to the persecution of Jews in Germany. It is said that these speeches were instigated, or were at least given approval, by the present administration.

3. EXECUTIVE PRECEDENTS—(A) PERTAINING TO AMERICAN CITIZENS

The following precedents show that it is an established principle of the United States to demand of other nations the privilege of religious freedom:

Religious persecutions in Turkey

On January 18, 1906, Mr. Elihu Root, Secretary of State, wrote a letter to the American Minister to Turkey in which he stated:

"The President's message to the Sultan and the instructions sent by the Department to the legation * * * should leave no doubt in the mind of the Turkish Government that the United States confidently and in common justice expects that American [religious, benevolent, and educational] institutions [in Turkey] shall be treated on an equal footing of benefit with those of other states." (Brackets ours.) Foreign Relations of the United States, 1906, II, p. 1378.

Discriminations against Hebrews in Switzerland

Considerable correspondence was had between the United States and Switzerland over the discrimination against Jews in Switzerland. (See Ex. Doc. No. 76, pp. 1–101.)

On November 5, 1857, Secretary of State Lewis Cass sent the following instructions to Mr. Fay, the United States Minister to Switzerland:

"I am directed by the President to instruct you to use all the means in your power to effect the removal of the odious restrictions complained of, which, it is understood, are contained in the laws of but four of the Swiss cantons. You are requested to inform the Department upon this point, and to state the names of the cantons in which these laws exist."

On April 17, 1858, Secretary Cass wrote the following letter to Mr. Fay:

"The President learns with pleasure that your efforts in behalf of the American Israelites in Switzerland have not been relaxed. The removal of the restrictions contained in the cantonal laws so oppressive to Jewish citizens of the United States is, as you are aware, a matter which the President has much at heart, and he indulges the hope that the measures taken by you to secure that result may be successful."

These negotiations resulted, on May 29, 1874, in the adoption of a new federal constitution by the Swiss Confederation, article 50 of which provided that "The free exercise of worship is guaranteed, within the limits compatible with public order and good morals." (House Ex. Doc. No. 78, p. 22.)

Persecutions of Christian missionaries in Hawaii

Mr. Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, on April 6, 1870, wrote Mr. Pierce, Minister to Hawaii, in part, as follows:

"It is a matter of regret that the Christian missionaries of the United States and of Hawaii to the Micronesian group should have experienced any obstacle in the prosecution of their calling, and especially that they should have been wronged in their person and property by the savage aborigines. It is hoped that the vessel of war which, it is understood, has been ordered thither, will have the effect of preventing any further outrages upon our citizens."

United States intercedes with Russia in behalf of American Bible Society

On May 27, 1882, Secretary of State Frelinghuysen sent to Mr. Hoffman, the Chargé d'Affaires in Russia, a letter from the American Bible Society, which declared that the agents of the society were forbidden to sell the Scripture in parts of the Russian Empire, and stated:

"Apart from its claims in common with other lawful American corporations to the kindly offices of the Government of the United States, there was in this case the unselfish aim of doing good, which commended it to the support of enlightened people."

Mr. Hoffman was directed as follows:

"To read the instruction to the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs and to express the hope that the Russian Government would examine into the allegations submitted, and if they were found to be well grounded, issue such orders as might be deemed right and best fitted to afford the desired relief" (Moore's Digest, VI, 335–336).

Our attitude over Austro-Hungarian Government's refusal to accept American Minister because of Jewish wife

On May 4, 1885, President Cleveland appointed the Honorable Anthony M. Keiley Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Vienna. Our Secretary of State was advised by the Austro-Hungarian Minister to the United States that:

"* * * The position of a foreign envoy wedded to a Jewess by civil marriage would be untenable and even impossible in Vienna."

Secretary of State Bayard, on May 18, 1885, wrote the Austro-Hungarian Minister, in part, as follows:

"The supreme law of this land expressly declares that 'no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States', and by the same authority it is declared that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.'

"This is a Government of laws, and all authority exercised must find its measure and warrant thereunder.

"It is not within the power of the President, nor of Congress, nor of any judicial tribunal of the United States, to take or even hear testimony or in any mode to inquire into or decide upon the religious belief of any official, and the proposition to allow this to be done by any foreign government is necessarily and a fortiori inadmissible.

"To suffer an infraction of this essential principal would lead to a disfranchisement of our citizens because of their religious belief, and thus impair or destroy the most important end which our constitution of government was intended to secure. Religious liberty is the chief cornerstone of the American system of government, and provisions for its security are embedded in the written charter and interwoven in the moral fabric of its laws.

"Anything that tends to invade a right so essential and sacred must be carefully guarded against, and I am satisfied that my countrymen, ever mindful of the suffering and sacrifices necessary to obtain it, will never consent to its impairment for any reason or any pretext whatsoever.

"In harmony with this essential law is the most equally potential unwritten law of American society that awards respect and delicate consideration to the women of the United States and exacts deference in the treatment at home and abroad of the mothers, wives, and daughters of the Republic.

"The case we are now considering is that of an envoy of the United States, unquestionably fitted, morally and intellectually, and who has been duly accredited to a friendly Government, toward which he is thoroughly well effected; who in accordance with the laws of this country has long since contracted and has maintained an honorable marriage, and whose presence near the foreign government in question is objected to by its agents on the sole ground that his wedded wife is alleged to entertain a religious faith which is held by very many of the most honored and valued citizens of the United States.

"It is not believed by the President that a doctrine and practice so destructive of religious liberty and freedom of conscience, so devoid of catholicity, and so opposed to the spirit of the age in which we live can for a moment be accepted by the great family of civilized nations or be allowed to control their diplomatic intercourse.

"Certain it is, it will never, in my belief, be accepted by the people of the United States nor by any administration which represents their sentiments. * * *"

On December 8, 1885, President Cleveland in his annual message to Congress referring to this incident stated:

"The reasons advanced (by that Government) were such as could not be acquiesced in without violation of my oath of office and the precepts of the Constitution, since they necessarily involved a limitation in favor of a foreign government upon the right of selection by the Executive, and required such an application of a religious test as a qualification for office under the United States as would have resulted in the practical disfranchisement of a large class of our citizens and the abandonment of a vital principle in our Government. The Austro-Hungarian Government finally decided not to receive Mr. Keiley as the envoy of the United States, and that gentleman has since resigned his commission, leaving the post vacant. I have made no new nomination, and the interests of this Government at Vienna are now in the care of the secretary of legation acting as chargé d'affaires ad interim."

President Roosevelt demands free exercise of liberty of conscience and religious worship of Mr. Litvinoff in negotiations for recognition of Soviet Russia

On November 16, 1933, President Roosevelt wrote Mr. Litvinoff, in part, as follows:

"As I have told you in our recent conversations, it is my expectation that after the establishment of normal relations between our two countries many Americans will reside temporarily or permanently within the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and I am deeply concerned that they should enjoy in all respects the same freedom of conscience and religious liberty which they enjoy at home. * * * We will expect that religious groups or congregations composed of nationals of the United States of America in the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will be given the right to have their spiritual needs ministered to by clergymen, priests, rabbis, or other ecclesiastical functionaries who are nationals of the United States of America, and that such clergymen, priests, rabbis, or other ecclesiastical functionaries will be protected from all disability or persecution and will not be denied entry into the territory of the Soviet Union because of their ecclesiastical status."

(B) PERTAINING TO ALIENS

President Harrison protests persecutions of Hebrews

The plight of the Jewish people in Russia in 1891 was referred to in President Harrison's message to Congress of December 9, 1891, in which the President said:

"This Government has found occasion to express in a friendly spirit, but with much earnestness, to the Government of the Czar its serious concern because of the harsh measures now being enforced against the Hebrews in Russia. By the revival of anti-Semitic laws, long in abeyance, great numbers of those unfortunate people have been constrained to abandon their homes and leave the empire by reason of the impossibility of finding subsistence within the pale to which it is sought to confine them. The immigration of these to the United States—many other countries being closed to them—is largely increasing and is likely to assume proportions which may make it difficult to find homes and employment for them here and to seriously affect the labor market. It is estimated that over 1,000,000 will be forced from Russia within a few years. The Hebrew is never a beggar; he has always kept the law—life by toil—often under severe and oppressive civil restrictions. It is also true that no race, sect, or class has more fully cared for its own than the Hebrew race. But the sudden transfer of such a multitude, under conditions that tend to strip them of their small accumulations and to depress their energies and courage, is neither good for them nor for us. The banishment, whether by direct decree or by not less certain indirect methods, of so large a number of men and women is not a local question. A decree to leave one country is, in the nature of things, an order to enter another—some other. This consideration, as well as the suggestions of humanity, furnishes ample ground for the remonstrances which we have presented to Russia, while our historic friendship for that Government cannot fail to give the assurance that our representations are those of a sincere well-wisher."

Protest against execution of Jews by Mohammedans

Secretary of State Mr. Lewis Cass, on July 29, 1857, instructed Mr. Chandler, Minister to The Two Sicilies, that this Government approved his joining with consuls from other nations in protesting against the conviction and execution of a Jew for blasphemy (Moore, Digest, VI, 348).

Jewish persecutions in Rumania

In 1870 Mr. Benjamin F. Peixotto, an American Hebrew, was appointed consul of the United States to Rumania for the principal purpose of promoting Jewish emancipation and cessation of anti-Jewish activity in that country. His credentials from President Grant, dated December 8, 1870, read, in part, as follows:

"Mr. Peixotto has undertaken the duties of his present office more as a missionary work for the benefit of the people he represents than for any benefit to accrue to himself—a work in which all citizens will wish him the greatest success. The United States, knowing no distinction of her own citizens on account of religion or nativity, naturally believes in a civilization the world over which will secure the same universal views."

Religious liberty in Spain

On December 8, 1876, Mr. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, transmitted the following instructions to Mr. Adee, Chargé d'Affaires:

"You are instructed to act in concert with Mr. Layard, Her Majesty's Minister, in the sense in which he is instructed by Lord Derby, and to take occasion to speak in a similar sense to the Minister of State, impressing upon him the deep interest which the question of religious liberty in Spain excites in the United States, and the strong hope that the steps lately taken by the Spanish Government, with reference to religious freedom and toleration, may not be followed by others of a more retrograde character, and that the rights which the Minister of State admits are secured to Protestants by the eleventh article of the Constitution may be entirely respected, and that the United States rely upon the good faith of the Spanish Government to promptly and firmly suppress any attempt from any quarter to infringe upon these rights" (Moore, Digest, VI, p. 175–176).

The United States interceded in behalf of Jews in Russia in 1891

Secretary of State James G. Blaine, on February 18, 1891, instructed Mr. Smith, American Minister to Russia, in part, as follows:

"The Government of the United States does not assume to dictate the internal policy of other nations, or to make suggestions as to what their municipal laws should be, or as to the manner in which they should be administered. Nevertheless, the mutual duties of nations require that each should use its power with due regard for the results which its exercise produces on the rest of the world. It is in this respect that the condition of the Jews in Russia is now brought to the attention of the United States, upon whose shores are cast daily evidences of the suffering and destitution wrought by the enforcement of the edicts against this unhappy people. I am persuaded that His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and his councilors, can feel no sympathy with measures which are forced upon other nations by such deplorable consequences" (For. Rel. 1891, p. 739).

Suppression of Jews in Rumania

Secretary of State John Hay, on July 17, 1902, wrote the United States Minister in Rumania, Charles S. Wilson, in part, as follows:

"* * * The United States offers asylum to the oppressed of all lands. But its sympathy with them in nowise impairs its just liberty and right to weigh the acts of the oppressor in the light of their effects upon this country and to judge accordingly.

"Putting together the facts, now painfully brought home to this Government during the past few years, that many of the inhabitants of Rumania are being forced by artificially adverse discriminations to quit their native country; that the hospital asylum offered by this country is almost the only refuge left to them; that they come hither unfitted by the conditions of their exile to take part in the new life of this land under circumstances either profitable to themselves or beneficial to the community, and that they are objects of charity from the outset and for a long time—the right of remonstrance against the acts of the Rumanian Government is clearly established in favor of this Government. Whether consciously and of purpose or not, these helpless people, burdened and spurned by their native land, are forced by the sovereign power of Rumania upon the charity of the United States. This Government cannot be a tacit party to such an international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Rumania are subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself, but in the name of humanity. The United States may not authoritatively appeal to the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin, to which it was not and cannot become a signatory, but it does earnestly appeal to the principles consigned therein, because they are principles of international law and eternal justice, advocating the broad toleration which that solemn compact enjoins, and standing ready to lend its moral support to the fulfillment thereof by its cosignatories, for the act of Rumania itself has effectively joined the United States to them as an interested party in this regard" (U. S. For. Rel., 1902, p. 912ff).

Anti-Semetic outbreak in Kishineff, Russia, in 1903

On April 19, 1903, 47 Jews were killed and several hundreds injured. Seven hundred houses and six hundred stores of Jews were looted and destroyed. President Theodore Roosevelt directed Secretary of State John Hay to instruct the American Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg to ask for an audience with the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs and to say:

"Excellency: The Secretary of State instructs me to inform you that the President has received from a large number of prominent citizens of the United States of all religious affiliations, and occupying the highest positions in both public and private life, a respectful petition addressed to His Majesty the Emperor relating to the conditions of the Jews in Russia. * * *

"I am instructed to ask whether the petition will be received by Your Excellency to be submitted to the gracious consideration of His Majesty. In that case the petition will be at once forwarded to St. Petersburg."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to proceed with the consideration of the bill (S. 2582) to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is pending before the Senate my motion to proceed to the consideration of S. 2582, the merchant-marine bill. The bill was introduced by reason of a message which came to the Congress from the President on the 4th of March. I should not be true to the members of my committee if I did not make every effort to guide to successful termination action on this bill.

After the message came there were frequent conferences between the merchant-marine subcommittee of the Commerce Committee of the Senate and a subcommittee from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House. We were in almost constant consultation for a period of 2 months and finally evolved the bill which has been introduced in the two Houses and which I assume will be passed in the House today.

It was not an easy task to formulate this legislation. It provides for subsidies to be paid representing the difference in the cost of construction of vessels in American yards and the cost of construction of similar vessels in foreign yards. It provides for a subsidy for the operation of American vessels, a subsidy sufficient to meet the difference in cost of operation under the American flag and the cost of operation under foreign flags or of a given ship under a foreign flag.

I realize that in the Senate are men who disapprove of the idea of a subsidy. They are fundamentally opposed to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator intends to discuss later the matters about which I wish to inquire, I shall not ask him to do so now; but I should like to have the Senator explain in some detail just how the difference in the cost of construction of a ship is to be ascertained. Who is to do it, and what other government is to be taken as a model in arriving at the difference; and who will determine, and how will they determine, the difference in the cost of operation; and is there anything in the bill which provides for a change in the subsidy for operation as different conditions may arise, making the difference of cost different from that which may exist at the time of the passage of the measure?

Have I made myself clear?

Mr. COPELAND. Perfectly; and in the course of my remarks I intend to attempt to answer the questions which the able Senator from Nebraska has asked. I shall pause long enough merely to say that the subsidy which is provided is subject to yearly correction; but as to the details of it, if the Senator will wait, I shall attempt to bring them out as I proceed with my discussion.

A great many things have been said here in the past 2 or 3 days, some of them rather bitter; but I wish to have Senators understand that so far as I am concerned I shall enter into no controversy with any Senator. I recognize his right to hold views which are contrary to mine. I respect him for his honesty of purpose. So what I shall attempt to say will be said in calmness and temperance of spirit, I trust. There is, however, so much misunderstanding apparent already in the discussion which has taken place that I think it wise that Senators should be advised regarding the purposes and details of the measure.

As I read history, I assume that Pericles was one of the greatest men Greece produced. Four hundred years before Christ he said:

> That nation which loses control of the sea, and the ability to carry its merchandise thereon—its name is writ in water.

That is exactly the possibility which presents itself to the American people. There is not only the possibility, but the probability that our merchant fleet will be wiped out, and that within a period of a very few years, unless appropriate legislation is passed, there will be only a limited number of American vessels upon the sea.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator is referring to American vessels engaged in overseas trade, foreign commerce?

Mr. COPELAND. Exactly; I am referring to vessels engaged in international trade.

When the great war broke out, there were only 13 American vessels—I think one of my friends said this morning that the number might have been 19, but only at the most 19 American vessels—engaged in transoceanic traffic. Had it not been for the fact that, in the providence of God, in our harbor of New York the Leviathan, then known as the Vaterland, was interned, I do not know what might have happened as regards the issues of the contest. When we entered the war we took over the Vaterland, renamed her the Leviathan, and 75,000 of our troops—the first troops that we sent in the American Expeditionary Force—were carried by that vessel, at the very time when those men were needed. Except for the fact that we had this great vessel available for the purpose, no one can tell what might have happened as regards the outcome of the war.

Mr. President, in the course of my remarks I hope to give the Senate some cold facts as to the situation of the American merchant marine.

In the world today, in international trade, there are vessels of 36,500,000 tons. The United States possesses slightly less than 3,000,000 tons of these vessels. Less than one-twelfth of the total vessels upon the seas in international trade are under the American flag.

The economic life of a vessel is estimated by the experts to be 20 years. Ninety percent of our tonnage is over 10 years of age. Seventy-six percent of our tonnage is from 11 to 20 years of age.

I wish it might be possible—I know it is not, because Senators are engaged in committee work—that all Senators might have the facts regarding this situation. I assume, however, that they will read in the RECORD these statistics, which to me are most impressive, and which I think should be regarded with great concern by every citizen of our country. It makes a vast difference to American agriculture and American manufacture and American business whether or not we have ships.

As the chart upon the wall shows, there was a time when 90 percent of our traffic was carried in American bottoms. It declined until just before the late war only 10 percent of American traffic was carried in American-flag ships. After the war, with our great campaign of shipbuilding, we restored our fleet to some extent—indeed, a very considerable extent—so that we carried 30 or 40 percent, even 50 percent, of our commerce in American-flag ships. Today, however, with the decline in shipbuilding in America and the increase of shipbuilding abroad, we are carrying less than one-third of our commerce in our own ships.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, has the Senator any figures as to what it has cost the Treasury of the United States in cold cash over the 10-year curve which he has just described?

Mr. COPELAND. In the way of losses?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In the way of losses and expenditures in the effort to maintain this progressive merchant-marine activity under the American flag and the ultimate failure of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; at a later time I shall attempt to give some figures on that subject.

In our domestic trade, our intercoastal trade, and our costal trade, 94 percent of our ships are over 10 years of age. In our foreign trade, which consists of 480 vessels, 84 percent are over 10 years old. We have in our mail service—and we have heard much about our mail contracts during the past couple of years—282 vessels of 1,900,000 tons burden. The total number of United States vessels afloat today of more than 2,000 tons each, excluding the Great Lakes, is 950, of about 5,000,000 tons altogether.

Of the 282 vessels in the mail service, 241, representing a million and a half tons, are 13 years old or more.

(At this point a message, which appears elsewhere in today's RECORD, was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House had passed House bill 8555, to develop a strong American merchant marine, to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes.)

Mr. COPELAND. That is good news, Mr. President. I welcome interruptions of this sort. After 3 days of careful consideration of this bill, as we have just learned from the reading clerk of the House of Representatives, that body has passed the bill. I hope it will not be long before the Senate does likewise.

I was saying that in the mail service 241 of our vessels are 13 years of age or older.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I have just been informed, I will say for the Senator's information, that in the House, with a Democratic majority of nearly 300, the bill was passed by a majority of 8 votes.

Mr. COPELAND. Which was enough to pass it. I hope the Senator is not pleased over the fact that the majority was not larger.

Sixty-seven of our vessels are 15 years old. One hundred and five are 16 years old. Fourteen are from 23 to 30 years old. I want Senators to observe the significance of these figures. Of these vessels which represent the mail service, 241 out of 282 are more than 13 years old. That means that in 7 years, unless some babies are born, the fleet family will be wiped out. Of the 282 in the mail service, 85 percent in number and 77 percent in tonnage are 20 years old.

We have heard much about the mail scandals. It is not my business to defend the mail contracts. If they are illegal or improperly made, if fraud or corruption were practiced in their formation, there is ample power to take care of the matter.

Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators in the rear of the Chamber probably did not hear the point of order made by the Senator from New York, namely, that there is disorder in the Chamber.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, they are probably still stunned from yesterday.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as I was saying, I have no defense to make of any contract entered into which was fraudulent or corrupt, but I regard the mail-contract system as water over the dam. In our legislative appropriation bill 2 years ago the President was given authority to modify or cancel any of the contracts if they were found not to be in the public interest or were found to be corrupt. The fact that so much has been said about these contracts is the only excuse I have for mentioning the subject at all.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. For a question.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not true that, notwithstanding the fact that these contracts were shown to be corrupt, the pending bill proposes to give the same group of men who entered into these corrupt contracts a subsidy in building new ships, and also a subsidy for remodeling their ships, then a subsidy for the purpose of giving them a chance to exchange ships, the authority to exchange ships with the Government of the United States, and then, if those subsidies are not enough, the authority is to be given unlimited power to give them further subsidies?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall attempt during the course of my remarks to reply to the Senator. When he spoke at some length a few days ago, emphasizing his views, I did not interrupt him.

Mr. WHEELER. If it bothers the Senator in the slightest degree, I shall not interrupt him.

Mr. COPELAND. It does not bother me at all, but I shall hope to answer all his questions, because part of what I have to say will be in an attempt to answer the Senator from Montana.

I wish to speak about these mail contracts really because, as the Senator from Montana has indicated by his question, the other shipowners are, like "old dog Tray", being condemned because they are associated with these wicked shipowners.

Let me say to the Senator from Montana, and to anyone else who may be interested, that there are under the American flag 950 ships. Assuming that every ship which was subsidized by a mail subvention was subsidized through corruption and fraud, it means that only 282 out of 950 are in that category; in other words, about 700 ships are not tarred with that stick.

Now let me say a little more about the mail scandals, so called. Members of the Senate forget that they are responsible for the low rates of interest which were afforded.

I have in my hand excerpts from the laws, first, the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, and the interest rate on loans was not fixed in that act. On June 6, 1924, the act of 1920 was amended, and the interest rate on loans on vessels engaged in foreign trade was fixed at 4½ percent; on vessels engaged in the coastwise trade or on inactive ships, the rate was fixed at 5¼ percent. In the amendments to the act in 1927 no change was made in the interest rates.

Now we come to the time when, perhaps very stupidly, we amended the law by the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, fixing the interest on loans to foreign-trade ships at "the lowest rate of yield to the nearest one-eighth of 1 percent of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917." The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] remembers that very well, because later he was active in changing that law; but that was the law at the time contracts were made under it.

I am not saying that I approve the judgment of the Postmaster General of that time, and of those in authority in the Shipping Board, when they made these loans at so low a rate of interest as one-eighth of 1 percent and from that point up. That was the law, however. If the law was administered without judgment, that is one thing; but when there is an attempt to say that there was fraud and corruption associated with the enterprise, the record shows to the contrary.

Mr. President, as the result of the contracts which were made under the law of 1928, there was very much controversy and discussion. There were many debates upon them in the Committee on Commerce, and on February 2, 1931, on motion in the Committee on Commerce, as I recall, of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the interest rate on loans on vessels engaged in foreign trade was fixed at 3½ percent, and the rate was continued at 5¼ percent on inactive vessels and on vessels engaged in coastwise trade.

Mr. President, I do not know what influence may have been used or what advantage taken of those in authority, but the fact that these low rates of interest could be given and were given is our fault. The rates were fixed by the law of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder whether the Senator has explained the Leviathan case in his discussion of the subject.

Mr. COPELAND. No; I have not, Mr. President. That is recent history.

Mr. LONG. It is still history in the making.

Mr. COPELAND. I should say it was current history.

Mr. LONG. History in the making.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. Current history.

Mr. LONG. I desire to get in on that the next time they pass around the dividend. That is about the only thing that I have been permitted to see the inside of.

Mr. COPELAND. If my friend the Senator from Louisiana does not get in on anything which is going on I should be surprised, because he is awfully smart!

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I wanted to say that much of the mail contracts, that I do not approve of all that was done. I think bad judgment was used. However, when we come to the question of the cancelation of those mail contracts I merely say that in my judgment, which is not good, perhaps, because I have no legal training, it will be mighty difficult to cancel 42 contracts. I think it will be shown that many of them were in the public interest, and I doubt exceedingly if fraud and corruption can be traced to any of them.

I wish that to be clear, because there is something more involved in what is before us today than the discussion of the bill. We have to have something to offer, something in the hands of the President to coax off some of the people who may have these contracts which are not favorable to the country, but with respect to which perhaps the courts may say that they are entirely legal.

However, let me remind the Senate again that less than one-third of our ships and considerably less than half of those in foreign commerce are now holding mail contracts.

Let me speak a little bit about tankers. We have made a large appropriation for naval vessels. With the scarcity of naval bases how are we going to make use of these vessels when we get them? Tankers are called the "legs of the Navy." The Navy can travel no faster than the oil tankers which carry the fuel can travel. We have 340 tankers in existence, representing about two and one-half million gross tons. Ninety percent of these are over 10 years old, and one-half of them are from 11 to 15 years old. The normal life of a tanker is considerably less than the normal life of the merchant vessel. The experts figure the normal life of the tanker is 15 years; and one-half of all our tankers are from 11 to 15 years old, and 90 percent of them are over 10 years old.

Further than that, the tankers which we now have are slow in their speed—from 10 to 12 knots an hour. We have only one tanker of 15 knots per hour. The naval vessels which we now have, and which we are about to build, would require tankers of from 15 to 18 knots per hour. Without naval bases we must depend on these tankers for fuel, and so the naval vessels, as I see it, are of little value without the auxiliaries.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator about these tankers, a subject with which I am not familiar? Who owns these tankers which the Senator is discussing?

Mr. COPELAND. They are privately owned.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it the big oil corporations which own them?

Mr. COPELAND. Most of them are owned by the big oil corporations, and others of them are owned by the small corporations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it the Senator's belief that the big oil corporations would be without these tankers except as we subsidized their construction?

Mr. COPELAND. We are not bound at all by this bill to build tankers.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did not understand that we were, but the Senator was urging the tanker problem as an exhibit, I assume, in behalf of the legislation, and I am unable to understand that the big oil companies require any construction subsidies in order to build tankers with which to bring oil to the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. The tankers of the big oil companies do not have to be of any such speed as I have mentioned this morning. If they are to be used as auxiliaries of the Navy, there will have to be some encouragement by the Government to make them useful. However, I am merely giving a picture of the merchant marine situation as it now exists.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does not the Navy have its own fuel auxiliaries?

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President. I now want to speak a little bit about the act of 1928. A great deal has been said about it being a failure. No informed person can say that. It just is not true that it has been a failure. The chief fault of the administration of that act, as I see it, is that there was a large investment in a few ships. We loaned on 9 tankers, we loaned on 2 sea trains, we loaned toward the building of 29 other ships. These 29 other ships, merchant marine ships, represented $142,000,000 of the total of $150,000,000 loaned, as I have indicated, under the act of 1928. And this can be said, that those ships which were built under the act of 1928 are the finest ships afloat. There are no finer ships anywhere than those.

I can readily see that if instead of loaning money for the purpose of building these expensive tankers, and for the sea trains, if those in authority had built 125 modern cargo ships there would not have been a bit of criticism today, and our merchant fleet would be on the way toward a successful career.

We loaned over $95,000,000 on these ships. The Government loans on the 29 vessels I have mentioned amounted to $95,429,231. Private interests invested $35,224,843.

Mr. President, just one more word about the act of 1928. During the period from 1922 to 1928 not an American ship was built for oversea trade. During that period the foreigners built 800 ships. I hope Senators will take pains at some time today to look at the chart on the wall of the Senate Chamber to see how Great Britain is forging ahead. I want them to see what her shipbuilding program is, what she is doing, as shown there at the top of the chart. Away down at the bottom, at the vanishing point, is where we are. Just as sure as the sun will rise tomorrow, in my judgment, unless we find a way to encourage the building of ships we will not have many vessels left in foreign trade.

It may well be asked, and I will speak of it now, anticipating the criticism, Why have we not built any vessels recently? The answer is perfectly plain. For the past 2 years we have had nothing but criticism of the American merchant marine, and particularly of the mail-carrying vessels. There has not been the slightest ambition on the part of any company to build any ships, and they have not been built.

When the World War came on, as I have told the Senate, we had 13, 14, or 15 ships in foreign trade. The cry from our allies, it will be recalled, was "Ships, more ships, and still more ships!" As a matter of fact, we entered upon a stupendous war building program. During the war we acquired about 2,500 vessels, aggregating twelve and one-half million tons, and we actually constructed 2,300 vessels, which cost this Nation about $3,000,000,000. The shipbuilding facilities for constructing those ships cost another half billion dollars, and when we include the amount paid for excessive freight rates before our entry into the World War it is safe to say that another billion and a half dollars should be added. In other words, $6,000,000,000 were invested during that period, and at the average rate of the subsidies which we are now paying such an expenditure would pay the subsidies for the next 300 years.

Now, just a word or two more about the loans which have been made and which have been very bitterly criticized. For new building and reconditioning, involving 89 vessels, the outstanding loans at this date aggregate $111,610,000. All the payments have been made up to date, with the exception of three and one-half million dollars, 3 percent of the whole; and, with the advanced payments, we have in hand today what the law requires and what the contracts require we should have. I doubt if the R. F. C. or the Federal loan banks can show any finer record than I have indicated.

Mr. President, if the things I have told the Senate are true, the foreign trade of our country in our own vessels is at the vanishing point. How are we going to prevent disaster? How are we to maintain a merchant marine?

I have asked many Senators if they favored an American merchant marine, they all say, "yes", and they seem to wonder why anyone should ask such a question. They say we need it in order to carry out and develop our commerce and to insure our shippers fair rates; we need it to afford employment to American citizens; we need such a fleet as an auxiliary to our Navy, and also to avoid the costly and unnecessary experiences of the past, one of which, as I have indicated, during the World War alone cost us $6,000,000,000. No one seems to doubt that a merchant marine is essential to our welfare as a nation. A few seem to think, however, that we can build up a merchant marine without Government aid. Our foreign competitors are not burdened with our high shipping construction and operating costs, yet their governments grant them liberal subsidies.

Consider the Normandie, that floating night club. It cost the French Government $52,000,000. I think that Americans ought to know something about what our friends across the sea are doing. The French loaned money to build the Normandie, the amount, as I have said, being $52,000,000. Then they granted an annual subsidy of $10,000,000, at current rates of exchange for its operation, and there is now pending and on its way to passage in the Chamber of Deputies of France a bill providing that the Government shall pay amortization as to principal and interest on the Normandie. In other words, the money that France, in the first instance, loaned to the French line for the construction of the Normandie is being paid out of the French treasury, and $10,000,000 is appropriated to operate that ship annually. The amount of money given for the building of that ship and for its subsidy is half what we ourselves have loaned to our shipowners for the construction of vessels.

It will be interesting to the Senate to know that every time we have had a reprint of the ship-subsidy bill the representatives of foreign governments have been on hand to secure copies of the bill. They are alert in order that nations abroad might know what America was contemplating.

Few Senators informed on this subject will say that our American shipowners, with their burden of high costs, can fare forth in the midst of a world-wide depression and make a success in competition with foreign shipowners. It seems to me that any school boy should know that to be impossible. Our merchant marine is already subsidized by ocean mail contracts under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, but if we do nothing, let these mail contracts lapse, and provide nothing in their stead, of course, we will soon be without an American merchant marine.

I wish to reply briefly to what my friend from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] said the other day about the maritime authority. I thought it was a terrible arraignment of American manhood that he could say, as he did say—and I know he said it in all sincerity—that the maritime authority would exercise "the wildest kind of judgment." He said at another time:

> In the first place, while I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, if we do not have greater scandals in connection with this measure, if it shall become a law, than we have ever had in the history of the United States in connection with shipping, then I miss my guess.

Further he said:

> It is perfectly asinine to say that a board sitting here in the city of Washington should have such authority. It is inconceivable to me that the President of the United States, if he studied this bill, if he examined these provisions, would for one moment sanction or sign a bill containing provisions which would result in scandal such as he must know and everybody else must know would follow.

Mr. President, have we become so degenerate as a nation that the President cannot find five men in the United States who are sufficiently honest, sane, sensible, and far-seeing to administer the law which we propose? I certainly feel that there are such men to be had.

The Senator from Montana positively stated that it was utterly impossible to find out the difference between the cost of construction of a ship built here and a ship built abroad, and a similar statement was made a few moments ago by the Senator from Nebraska. I desire to give some thought to that particular suggestion.

We have had an instance only recently of an actual experience regarding the question of difference in cost. Mr. BLAND in the House of Representatives the other day spoke about this matter. He quoted evidence which was presented to his committee showing that France called for the construction of several ships, that bids were submitted to Japan and Great Britain, and that Great Britain got the job. Japan does not have the raw material and has to import it from abroad.

In this bill we have provided that the Authority must take into consideration all these matters. However, I want to go into that a little more in connection with what Mr. Haag testified.

In the hearings Mr. Haag, who is an authority on this subject, an expert in the Commerce Department, stated:

> In my judgment, the only answer to that question is to say that it will be done in a fair and reasonable way to get the fair and reasonable cost. I know of no method by which you can get the actual cost, but I do know and I feel certain that the shipyards of this country will whole-heartedly cooperate to assist the authority when there is assurance that the shipyards will have steady, continuous work. I am confident that they will furnish the authority with everything they have to show the costs in this country. If we know what the American ship costs—and I do not believe we have ever known before—we can then determine within a very close margin of error because of the high labor factor that goes into the ship, what the foreign ship costs. In other words, there is no secret of what the rates of the various craftsmen are in foreign yards—the hourly rates. We, of course, know what they are here. And when you convert this data to man-hours you come very close to arriving at a fair differential. * * * The reason, I say, you cannot arrive at an exact one is because even amongst our own shipyards there are such wide fluctuations, because of the different set-ups in the various yards in the ways of charging overhead that you really have almost the same conditions as though you were trying to match foreign with American costs. But assuming the yard is responsible, that it has modern equipment and is an efficient yard that is on a parity, and then we will also show that the man-hours that were put in on this job correspond with the man-hours on the foreign ship, based on the lower rates of wages.

We can easily bring out the difference in cost relative to the pay of seamen. That was done before our committee. We know definitely what the various men are paid in other countries as compared with our own.

Then Mr. Haag proceeded:

Now, the material cost, the actual small amount of material cost, can be determined quite readily. The major item is determining the difference in labor costs, where the percent, as compared to the material, is so very high, and I think we can arrive at a very close approximation which will be fair and reasonable to both the Government and the applicant.

By and large the actual cost of building a ship is the labor cost. That was very thoroughly discussed and has been considered by the committee. We have no doubt at all that within reasonable limits the difference in the cost of construction and the difference in the cost of operation can be ascertained.

I am frank to say that, in my opinion, the success or failure of the plan will depend to a great extent upon the personnel of the maritime authority provided for by the bill. We believe wise men can be found to take the positions; we purposely made the term of the service a long one and the pay a generous one in order that we might attract men to the maritime authority of the very highest standing. We propose to pay the same as the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are paid, $12,000 per year; and the appointment is for 12 years, which would guarantee, we believe, men of the same type as those who are now attracted to the Federal courts.

I wish now to speak a little more about a matter which I have already mentioned, the progress of our merchant marine.

Our merchant marine was in its ascendancy between 1820 and 1860. In the days of the Yankee clippers 80 to 90 percent of our foreign water-borne commerce was carried in American bottoms. In 1910 the ratio had sunk to slightly less than 10 percent. We were so busily engaged in winning the West and in exploiting our national resources that we failed to take advantage of the transition from sail to steam. Our people were no longer ship-minded, and the American merchant marine stood a fair chance of passing out of existence when the impact of the World War awoke us to a realization of our critical position.

Practically overnight all foreign tonnage was withdrawn from our ports. English and French ships were imperatively needed to carry troops, munitions, and food to the various scenes of conflict. For a matter of 50 years we have stood idly by, permitting our commerce to be carried in foreign-flag ships. We had rented our transportation, and now, with bursting granaries and accumulating surpluses of manufactured goods, our ocean transportation failed and we paid the penalty for our short-sightedness.

In 1912 it cost $2.50 to ship a bale of cotton to Europe. In the latter part of 1914 we were paying $60 a bale for the same service—and wheat carriage soared from 5 cents to 60 cents a bushel. It was not that the warring nations did not need our wheat, cotton, pork products, tinned foods, and fruit and manufactured articles, but their ships were hurrying men and munitions to the front. Enemy submarines were taking their toll. The well-ordered system of peaceful ocean transport broke down and it has been conservatively estimated that the lack of American ships during the first 2 years of the World War cost our farmers a billion dollars, owing to the lack of transportation for their products.

Then we made a desperate effort to retrieve our old position as an ocean carrier. We embarked on a program of shipbuilding on which we spent over three billions of dollars. Now the interest on $3,000,000,000 is $150,000,000 a year. Had we wisely used twenty millions each year for the preceding 50 years to help create an American merchant marine we should have saved ourselves two-thirds of the cost of our wartime fleet and much humiliation, as we realized that the greater part of the war-built ships could not be economically operated as commercial carriers; that the greater part of the emergency fleet had to be scrapped; and that generations to come would help to pay principal and interest of the $3,000,000,000 our experiment had cost.

Lack of American-flag ships caused the cost of the Boer War to be borne by the farmers and manufacturers of the United States. England withdrew her ocean carriers to transport men and munitions, and, in effect, we bore the brunt of the loss through increased freight rates caused by failure to market our own products in world markets.

When President Theodore Roosevelt sent our white fleet around the world the spectacle did not impress the nations of the world as much as we fondly imagined. That fleet was supplied and provisioned by foreign-flag ships, because the United States merchant marine did not have sufficient auxiliary carriers to give our warships the necessary aid.

Again the crying need of the United States for ships was evidenced in 1926, when the British coal strike diverted much of the tonnage on which we depended to other fields. We again were confronted with a serious situation. Fortunately the Shipping Board was able to place in service enough of our war-built ships to carry our products to market, and it has been estimated that $600,000,000 were saved to our farmers and manufacturers.

I wish I had it in my power to give emphasis to that, to stress what it means, not alone to those who live in New York City but to every farmer and producer in the United States—the necessity of having American ships in order that those products may be taken the world over. Without them, the prohibitive cost is so great that it is impossible for farmers and producers and manufacturers to compete effectively with foreigners.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question without interrupting the thread of his remarks?

Mr. COPELAND. Surely.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has put considerable emphasis on the importance of American ships for the transportation of American commodities into a war zone and on the high seas during a war period.

If our foreign policy should change hereafter, and we should cease to adhere to the old complete freedom-of-the-seas philosophy—and I strongly suspect our policy is to change in that respect—and if in the future we should go on a sort of f. o. b. New York basis, if any belligerent should desire our commodities after having gone to war with some other foreign nation, would it not totally change the conception to which the Senator is addressing himself?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; if it should actually be accomplished, it probably would; but, of course, I do not look for the dawning of the millennium.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think this is not the dawning of the millennium. I think this is merely the dawning of a new and practical and rational common-sense conception of what we should do when we confront other nations at war with each other.

Mr. COPELAND. I think in war time the Senator is right about it; but if we take the time of the English coal strike it would not be quite the same, would it? At that time we were very seriously embarrassed. I happened to be appealed to by shippers in my State. I was in the Senate at the time and I went to see the Shipping Board about the matter. Wheat was piled up at Mississippi ports and at Galveston, fruits on the Pacific coast, and fruits in my State, the apples and pears, and so forth, to say nothing of manufactured products. There, without an effective American merchant marine of our own which we could commandeer, in a sense, to carry our own products, we were seriously embarrassed, and we should be in the future if we should not have such vessels.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is true. The thing the Senator said which challenged my interest at the moment related to the war conception. He seemed to be indicating that American agriculture and American commerce would lose some of their opportunities to profit from foreign trade during foreign wars unless we had our own ships. I am asserting, at least for myself, that I am left entirely cold by any appeal for the creation of a system under which we could maintain foreign commerce in belligerent foreign war zones during foreign wars. I have no interest whatever in the continued maintenance of an American policy which insists that our business must have a chance to profit from foreign wars. I have no interest whatever in it.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with the Senator. I honor him for his idealism, and I desire to share it so far as I am capable of doing. At the same time, however, there can be no question that in time of foreign war the belligerent nations would be so occupied that their vessels undoubtedly would be used in a way which would embarrass us if we did not have vessels of our own.

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the other hand, Mr. President, within the week the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate has ordered reported a bill which is not yet upon the calendar, but will be as soon as reported by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], which proposes to deny passports to any American into a foreign war zone during a foreign war. That is simply an indication of the direction in which our new foreign policies are going in respect to the freedom of the seas, and I think it is a very wise direction.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That robs the ship-subsidy contemplation of any argument in respect to commerce during a foreign war. That is the only point I am undertaking to make.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, when the Senator says that he is assuming that this policy will be adopted and adhered to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is true.

Mr. COPELAND. There might be very serious question about that. If it could be exactly as the Senator states, without doubt the position he takes is correct; but there will be other circumstances where the condition will be quite different. There can be no question about the advantage to American shippers, whether they are shipping in or shipping out, of having ships of our own.

I remember very well the criticism that arose during my service upon the Commerce Committee when a British ship loaded up out in the Northwest with apples shipped by private concerns where she was acting as a common carrier. Then on her own account she bought apples which she took to South America, unloaded her own apples first, and glutted the market. That created a condition where there was no sale for those which were shipped by the private shippers.

I have seen the same thing with reference to a railroad terminal owned by a given railroad—a terminal which was used by other railroads. Of necessity, the railroad owning that terminal made use of it first, and gave its facilities to the competing railroads only to suit its own convenience.

As I see it, we cannot exist as a world maritime power by expedients. At the present time we are carrying only one-third of our ocean-borne commerce; and compared with other maritime nations, we rate third in tonnage, fourth in speed, and last in the age of our ships.

In considering this bill, the committee has had one idea in view, and that is to remedy these conditions. It is realized that a bill, to be effective, must contain a plan that will insure the building of the requisite amount of tonnage. Obsolete ships must be replaced by speedier vessels embodying Navy suggestions. Employment must be furnished shipyards, and the thousands of workmen in our mills and factories who contribute to building a ship.

I wish Senators at some time would look through the testimony to see a remarkable chart which is included in the hearings of the committee, showing exactly how the building of a ship contributes to the good of each State. It seemed to me like a good argument. Every State in the Union produces something which is useful and needed in the construction and equipment of a ship.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Including the taxes to pay for the subsidies under this bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; of course. I assume from what the Senator says that he is utterly opposed to any subsidy. Am I correct in that?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I indicated to the Senator yesterday what my view is on that subject. So far as construction subsidies are concerned I have to be shown.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator, I know, is sincere in his position.

In part 3 of the hearings before the Commerce Committee is a very interesting chart showing what is supplied by various States of the Union in one way or another, directly or indirectly, in the construction of a ship. Alabama supplies iron ore, limestone, coal, coke, pig iron, steel, cotton, and yellow pine. Michigan supplies iron ore, limestone, cement, copper products, white pine, plywood, hardware, tools, furniture and paints. Washington supplies Oregon pine, cedar, spruce, cement, machinery, wire rope, and veneers.

It is a very interesting chart. I do not wish to overlook any State. Every State in the Union contributes, in one way or another, to the building and equipment of these vessels. As the chart indicates, every State in the Union has the possibility of contributing.

A definite, well-ordered plan of operation must be established; and this, it is believed, the present bill will accomplish. The bill not only encourages shipbuilders and operators, but it amply protects the Government.

A résumé of the essentials of the bill indicates that the United States stands committed to the building and maintenance of an effective merchant marine. We must have sufficient ships to carry at least 50 percent of our waterborne commerce, both export and import. That was the suggestion of the President in his message—that our merchant marine should be built up to a point where it would be capable of carrying 50 percent of our commerce. These ships must be of such a character as to operate efficiently.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is that 50 percent of our present foreign commerce, or is it 50 percent of our foreign commerce at a time when that commerce was entirely dependent upon our foreign loans; or when is it that we are to measure 50 percent of our commerce? That is a question which is very interesting to me.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator should ask that question of the President of the United States. He is the one who spoke of the 50 percent. As a matter of fact, however, we do ship things out. We ship tremendous numbers of automobiles from Detroit, and many of them are carried to the Orient in vessels of a foreign flag, by a line of vessels not hesitating to have a standing offer of 10 percent under any rate that can be given by any other shipping line. In one way or another, we have a tremendous amount of commerce to be sent abroad.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am quite serious in this inquiry, because it goes to one of the fundamental objections I have to the construction subsidy section, as the Senator knows.

I have insisted that in a state of international flux, both as respects money and trade, it is impossible for us accurately or within any reasonable jurisdiction of accuracy to know the answer to the problem raised by the pending bill.

Here comes again in the President's message the thought that our objective is to have Government ships to carry 50 percent of our trade. What trade? That trade was $5,000,000,000 at one time, when it was inspired by war. It continued to be four or five billion dollars when we were silly enough to lend Europe the money with which to pretend to buy from us. As soon as our trade was not inspired by war and as soon as it was not inspired by foreign loans it dropped to a billion or two billion dollars.

What is it the President wants us to do, to make a merchant marine responsive to the need of carrying 50 percent of $5,000,000,000 worth of foreign trade, or $2,000,000,000 worth of foreign trade? What is it that he means?

Mr. COPELAND. I would say that the President means that at least half the trade indicated on the chart on the wall should be carried in our ships. I do not know what the trade will be next year or the year after. I assume that when the world recovers from the jitters and when we resume "normalcy", to quote a Republican word, there will be an increase in international trade.

Mr. LONG. When will that be?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is a better prophet than I. He perhaps has an idea on that subject. Such a time must come; otherwise the world will go to pot.

Mr. President, I feel very seriously on this subject. This is not the time to discuss it or to consider it, but I am satisfied that such a time must come. I have faith to believe that under right conditions there will be a restoration of business in the United States. I am not going to discuss today what I regard to be right conditions, although I have some convictions on the subject. Certainly, when we have a restoration of normal conditions our manufacturers are going to make goods which will be shipped.

I am not satisfied with all the measures which have been proposed and formulated for the relief of industry. I have in mind now a great industry which is hampered by lack of money. It has the orders, it has a plant which cost millions, it has everything but money, and it cannot get money. I find that when it goes to the R. F. C. it has to present exactly the same kind of collateral and produce the same gilt-edged security that it would have to produce if it went to a bank. Unless we can have a restoration of credit in some manner and form we cannot have a restoration of business. But I have faith to think that we are going to have a restoration of credit brought about in some other manner than by the appropriation of money on the part of the Government. When we come to that point, there will certainly be the need of ships to carry our products across the ocean and to bring back the raw materials which are needed for the development of various manufactured articles here.

I cannot answer the question about what 50 percent means, whether it means 50 percent of what we have today or 50 percent of what we are to have next year, or 50 percent of what we will have 10 years from now; nevertheless, unless we can restore these ships, unless we can have some babies born to the fleet, as I said a little while ago, the merchant marine family will become extinct. I am not going to split hairs as to just when that is going to be, but we are not prepared under present conditions to carry 50 percent of our commerce.

The bill commits the Government to the building and maintenance of an effective merchant marine capable of carrying 50 percent of our water-borne commerce, both export and import, and these ships must be of a character to operate efficiently as naval auxiliaries.

They are to be owned and operated under the American flag by citizens of the United States. They will be so regulated as to assure adequate service under all emergencies at equitable rates. Our merchant marine must be composed of the best equipped, safest, and most suitable types of vessels constructed in the United States and manned with a trained and efficient personnel.

When we come to that, I wish to say that both the Committee on Commerce of the Senate and the committee in the House stand committed to 100-percent American personnel upon these ships. We have gone further already than ever before and have made exception only as regards passenger ships which come from foreign ports, where it is necessary that the deck stewards and the dining-room stewards should have a knowledge of French or Spanish or some other language in order that they may be efficient servants. But we have determined that the deck officers and all the subordinate officers, that the seamen and, so far as possible, the stewards shall be American citizens, native born or fully naturalized. That has been our aim in the framing of the pending bill.

I have already indicated that the bill provides for the establishment of a maritime authority. We have sought in the bill so far as we could to separate the judicial or semijudicial functions from those which are purely administrative. We have left in the Department of Commerce the control of navigation and operation of all those ships which we have left, and we have left the Maritime Authority wide power regarding, first, the determination of the amount of the subsidy, both construction and operating, and also wide authority regarding regulation of rates.

The third title covers the adjustment of existing ocean mail contracts, with the intent, as the President has said, that he does not want any indirect subsidies, any subventions. He wants, frankly, to let the American people know what the money is used for, and the subsidy is provided for the definite purpose of marking the difference between the cost of construction in American yards and the cost of construction abroad, and for the operation of an American ship as compared with the operation of a similar ship under a foreign flag.

One of the evils which arose from the mail-contract system adopted in 1928 was that in practically all cases the maximum compensation permitted by law was adopted as the basis of the contract, and the shipowners got the money. The amount which could be justified as covering mail pay, differentials, and equalization of foreign subsidy was in many cases exceeded. In some contracts the excess of mail pay was to be wholly or partially absorbed by new construction requirements, and it is evident that some of this new construction has not been performed, thus creating overpayments not contemplated when the contracts were let. To what extent this failure of performance is due to the world depression, when lack of cargo and depressed rates made operation costly and difficult, and to what extent it is due to uncertainty as to governmental policy and to other reasons, or to no reason, is all controversial and debatable.

Mr. President, granting all the evils of the past, that is, assuming that they really were evils, we hope that the pending bill is so written that there will be no such loopholes as we found in the old act. No construction differential can be paid unless our bill S. 2582 contains no such loopholes. No construction differential can be paid unless and until the ship is actually being constructed, and the Government gets everything it pays for. The operating subsidy covers the operating differentials and neutralizes the effect of foreign subsidy.

The adjustment of ocean mail contracts provided in title III permits consideration of all pertinent facts, including the extent to which payments made under each contract have in effect offset higher construction or reconditioning costs, and consequent higher capital charges incurred in the United States; the extent to which payments have offset certain higher American operating costs, actually incurred; the extent to which new construction or reconditioning required has been effected; and the extent to which obligations to the Government have been amortized or liquidated.

Provision is made for adjustment to the new basis as outlined by the President in his message.

The authority of the President over such contracts, already granted by Congress, is not infringed upon, but is extended to cover the period of negotiation.

This equitable and businesslike method appeals to your committee as eminently fair to both the contractor and the Government.

Title IV relates to the replacement of obsolete existing ships, and is directed toward the plan of insuring the construction of new vessels in American shipyards.

If those who are really interested in the bill will study it carefully, they will see that the committee has attempted to discourage the reconditioning of ships, because if the Government is to bear the differentials representing the difference of cost between foreign and domestic operations, of necessity the Government is interested in having these vessels so modern and so efficient that the subsidy shall be as low as possible.

I have in mind now a line which operates seven vessels in a very important service. Two of these vessels are modern vessels; as fine as any afloat. Five of them are of varying ages, but at least three or four of them are so obsolete, with old-type machinery, that the cost of fuel is excessive. Certainly we have no desire to let Uncle Sam "hold the bag", as the modern expression is, and to pay out a needless amount of money. This same line which now has these 7 vessels could operate as efficiently and as effectively as at present with 4 vessels—the 2 new ones it has and 2 more of the same type. However, without getting rid of the obsolete ships there will be this overhead expense, which, of course, is a burden upon the Treasury, and is bound to be under the philosophy of this bill. Therefore every effort has been made in writing the bill to see to it that there shall be a discouragement in the use of those vessels which are obsolete, and which should be either scrapped or taken over for some other service where efficient operation is not so important.

Title V provides for the extending of financial aid to the merchant marine. Instead of a subvention granted under the name of "ocean mail pay"—a designation misleading in character—the present act states that any citizen of the United States may appear before the authority and request aid in the construction, outfitting, and equipment of new vessels, or the reconditioning of vessels already built to be used on essential routes in the foreign commerce of the United States.

However, as regards reconditioning, let me make emphasis again upon the fact that the bill makes very clear that reconditioning can be done only in exceptional cases. It is the desire of those who have formulated the bill to see to it that we have built up a merchant marine of new and modern ships.

The authority, after satisfying itself as to the necessity of the indicated route, and, after consultation with the Navy Department, that the construction of such vessels is in line for national-defense purposes, and that the applicant has the ability, experience, and money necessary to build and operate such vessel, shall determine the difference in the foreign and domestic cost of actual construction or reconditioning, and grant a subsidy equal to the difference between the cost of construction or reconditioning in an American and in a foreign shipyard. Construction loans are predicated upon three-fourths of the appraised foreign cost of the vessels, the owner or operator paying one-fourth. It will be noted that since the shipbuilder receives the construction differential indicated, there can be no profit to the ship operator in the money received from the Government.

These contracts are so made, in short, that the maritime authority is party to the contract, and has full information, and by reason of amendments which were offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] an effort has been made to make reasonably certain that there shall be no collusion in bidding and that these ships in form and construction shall actually be such as the maritime authority contemplated.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to present a hypothetical case to the Senator and ask him if my conclusions are correct. I do not know that the Senator has discussed title V of the bill, which relates to the construction differential subsidy, the provisions of which are set out on page 66 of the bill. Let me ask the Senator, if this bill should become law, and, if it should be proposed that a concern should build a ship which would cost, say, $20,000,000, would not the Government, under the provisions in title V, advance and pay as an outright gift, $8,000,000 out of the total cost of $20,000,000?

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BONE. Will the Senator wait a moment? I have not perfected my question. That is upon the assumption that a ship which cost $20,000,000 in this country might be built for 60 percent of that cost in a foreign shipyard in a country to which it might perhaps be the purpose of the ship line to run its ships.

In other words, Mr. President, if it is proposed to build a $20,000,000 ship, and it could be demonstrated to the board created under this bill that the ship could be built in a foreign shipyard for $12,000,000, or 60 percent of the cost in an American yard of comparable size and character, would it not, under this bill, be possible for the Government, through this board, to advance $8,000,000 out of the $20,000,000, if that represented 40 percent of the cost, or that being the differential? The bill seems to clearly indicate that there is such power, and I wonder if the Senator agrees with my idea that it could be done.

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. I hope the board will never consent to the building of a $20,000,000 ship, but if it did consent to it, that would be the case, based upon the message of the President, which says that the subsidy should cover the difference in the foreign and domestic cost of building such a ship.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I may ask a question?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Suppose the hypothetical ship cost $20,000,000 to build in America——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator take a $10,000,000 ship?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well; I will take a $10,000,000 ship. Suppose this ship cost $10,000,000 to build in America, $6,000,000 to build in Great Britain, and $3,000,000 to build in Japan; is the construction subsidy $7,000,000?

Mr. COPELAND. I should desire to say at once that a vessel to be operated on the Atlantic Ocean would never be founded upon a Japanese price.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the Senator thinks that the $3,000,000 base would apply only to ships that are going to run on the Pacific?

Mr. COPELAND. I should say that it would, but I desire to answer more fully than that. There is no prospect of such a price in Japan, as I shall show pretty soon.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to pursue my question a moment further. Assuming that what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has suggested or implied in his question, that a $10,000,000 ship might conceivably be built in a Japanese shipyard for $3,000,000, that would leave the differential in price $7,000,000. That amount would of necessity have to be the Government's contribution for the building of a $10,000,000 ship, and I assume, of course, that the answer would be that the Government would pay that in the event trans-Pacific shipping were to be handled in that fashion.

I observe that the bill contains this provision, which is taken almost word for word from the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, because it is virtually a restatement of section 702 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, which deals with the requisitioning of vessels for war purposes. It provides that the following vessels, which are enumerated in categories, may be taken over and purchased or used by the United States for national defense during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President, which, of course, means that these vessels would be used in a war in which the United States was a party. I call the Senator's attention to this language:

In such event the owner—

That is to say, the owner who got a $10,000,000 vessel with a $3,000,000 investment, assuming that the subsidy is as indicated on the Pacific coast—

> In such event the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of the taking.

It is interesting to note what might happen under that sort of a set-up. Here would be a big steamship company which became the owner of a $10,000,000 vessel of the latest type, fireproof presumably, and one of the finest vessels afloat, perhaps, in her class in those waters, a $10,000,000 vessel passing into the hands of the private shipbuilder for an expenditure on his part of only $3,000,000.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And he borrows 75 percent of that.

Mr. BONE. It seems bad enough as far as I have gone. I will leave some of the horrible details to other Senators.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has not read all of it.

Mr. BONE. No. I am willing that the Senator shall read it when I am through stating my view of the matter. Assume that the Government becomes embroiled in a war with a foreign power, the national integrity and safety is at stake, and the Government wants this vessel, and goes back to the owner of the vessel, to whom it has given $7,000,000 out of $10,000,000 of the cost of that vessel.

The President proclaims there is a national emergency; Congress declares war; the Government goes out and gets that vessel to transport troops, materials, and supplies to the base of war, and in such event the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel. If it were a brand-new vessel, conceivably the Government would have to pay to the shipbuilder $10,000,000 for that vessel, and there would be a clean profit to him of $7,000,000 on the transaction. Of course, I will admit there are possibly worse things than that under the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment. I want first to answer the Senator from Washington, and then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BONE. Will the Senator from New York be courteous and yield to me for a moment further?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BONE. It has been called to my attention that my analysis of the profit flowing to the private shipbuilder errs on the side of almost vulgar conservatism on my part. In the first place, the shipbuilder would get a $7,000,000 gift from the Government with which to build a $10,000,000 ship, so the $7,000,000 would be velvet and profit for him.

Mr. COPELAND. No.

Mr. BONE. Assuming that the ship could be built in a Japanese yard for $3,000,000, and it was a $10,000,000 ship, the shipowner would get $7,000,000. That is an extreme case, but it is a possible case. The shipowner would get $7,000,000 velvet or profit or whatever term one may care to apply to it in the first instance; then the Government comes along in time of national peril and takes the vessel back from him and pays him, if it is a brand-new vessel, $10,000,000 for it, so he has another $7,000,000 out of it; and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who sits behind me, has directed my attention to the fact he has made a net profit of $14,000,000 on a $10,000,000 transaction.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I will yield in just a moment. I said in the beginning that I was not going to permit this presentation of mine to degenerate into a controversy. I am going to answer the question, but I am not going to permit the discussion to be prolonged by any extraneous material. If the Senator from Missouri has a question to ask, after I shall have answered the Senator from Washington, I will be glad to yield to him.

Mr. CLARK. The only thing I want to do, I will say to the Senator from New York, is to get the figures straight. As I understand the situation, what would happen in the case cited by the Senator from Washington is this: For a ship which could be constructed in Japanese yards for $3,000,000, and in an American yard for $10,000,000, there would be given to the man who built the ship an outright gift of $7,000,000; he would be loaned three-fourths of the other three million; so that he would only have to put up cash money to the extent of $750,000. Then, in the event of war, the Government would come along and pay him $10,000,000 for the ship, which would be another seven million. So on the original investment of $750,000 he would make a profit of $14,000,000. He could pay off the Government loan and have $11,000,000 left of clear velvet.

Mr. COPELAND. Nothing could be more ridiculous and absurd than the suggestion just made. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to page 108, beginning at line 11, where he will find the following provision:

> In the case of a vessel which has received a construction-loan subsidy as provided in part I, title V, of this act, in determining fair actual value under this paragraph consideration shall be given to the fact that such construction-loan subsidy was paid by the Government.

So, of course, in fixing the value of the ship to be taken over under the circumstances cited the fact that he had the subsidy would be given consideration.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I know the Senator will acquit me of any desire unnecessarily to occupy his time, but this is an important matter and other Members of the Senate have agreed with my conclusions. I ask the Senator now the reason for this very obscure language which would challenge any lawyer in this body. I will read the same language the Senator has just called to my attention:

> In the case of a vessel which has received a construction loan subsidy as provided in part I, title V, of this act, in determining fair actual value under this paragraph consideration shall be given to the fact that such construction loan subsidy was paid by the Government.

What does that sort of vague language mean or what does it imply? It merely means that they have to consider it; they do not have to do anything. Is the Senator willing that this language shall be changed so as to provide that in the event a subsidy was given to the company the amount of the subsidy shall be deducted from the amount paid to the company?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly, I should be glad to have such an amendment adopted.

Mr. BONE. As found in the bill the language is flabby and evasive, and it means nothing.

Mr. COPELAND. No; it is not "flabby and evasive." Let me read further from line 19:

> (c) The President shall ascertain the fair compensation for such taking over and purchase or use and shall certify to Congress the amount so found by him to be due.

But let me say to the Senator, that I think it might be made clearer, and I should be glad to have it made clearer.

Mr. BONE. I will say to the Senator that I should like to see incorporated in the bill a provision to the effect that if Uncle Sam puts a dollar into a ship then the Government shall not be mulcted by the shipowner in the event of war, but he shall surrender back to the Government every penny he got, because the national defense is more important than are private shipbuilders, and it is grossly unfair that Uncle Sam should give shipowners this money, not only compensate them in this generous way, but in time of war give them more money; so that an instrumentality created, at least theoretically, under this bill to aid the Government instead is to be used as an instrumentality financially to oppress the Government in time of war.

Mr. COPELAND. I am with the Senator 100 percent, and I wish the Senator would formulate the language. That is the reason we have the bill before us. The committee has given consideration to this matter; I have no doubt we have overlooked many things, perhaps there was not always due care as to the details of the language; it may well be that in this instance we were not definite enough, but what we intended was to make it very clear that the Government would not pay to any shipowner an amount beyond the real value of the ship, deducting any subsidy which the owner received.

Mr. President, a wholly desirable feature of the new legislation is the tremendous impetus it gives in maintaining the American standard of living. Whenever or wherever a ship is built it has been estimated that 85 to 90 percent of original cost goes to labor. That labor is not confined to the actual work done in the shipyard. Iron, timbers, silverware, rope, a thousand and one articles are purchased from the manufacturer, and mills and factories in every State are benefited when a ship is constructed.

A little while ago I called attention in the record of the hearings to the chart showing the geographical distribution of the supplies which may be needed, representing every State in the Union.

It has been pointed out that the cost of building a cargo ship in the United States approximates 40 percent more than it does abroad. This operates against the American shipowner and, in addition, owing to our higher standards of living, it costs more to operate that same ship. Wages are lower abroad and living conditions are lower. This means higher construction and operating costs for the American shipowner and it also means that greater sums must be set aside for depreciation and interest charges, and that the cost of insurance is correspondingly higher. The labor of the American manufacturer is protected by the tariff but foreign shipping is an international business and some other means of equalization must be found.

The President, in his message to Congress, proposes a subsidy "based upon providing for American shipping Government aid to make up the differential between American and foreign shipping costs. It should cover, first, the difference in the cost of building ships; second, the difference in the cost of operating ships; and, finally, it should take into consideration the liberal subsidies that may foreign governments provide for their shipping." In this brief and most comprehensive statement is contained the germ of the maritime law we hope to place upon our statute books.

Title VI provides that certain duties vested in the hands of the Shipping Board, the Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, and certain authority held by the Department of Commerce, are transferred to the maritime authority. Outstanding construction loans, proceeds from the sale of surplus ships, are to be credited to the authority. Provisions for transferring the insurance fund are also made.

The inevitable conclusion from reading the President's message is that it contemplates subsidy of American vessels under private ownership. In this he is in agreement with what has always been the expressed wish of Congress. Careful consideration has been given by Congress to the possibilities of Government ownership and of Government operation, and the experience and methods of other countries have been thoroughly studied. In 1920, 1922, and in 1928 the arguments pro and con were thoroughly aired, and the result has always been that Congress overwhelmingly favored a merchant marine privately owned and operated.

We gave consideration in the committee to all the problems connected with Government ownership, and reached the conclusion, there being no difference of opinion in the committee, that it would be impossible to build ships without Government credit extended to private owners.

Your committee has been unable to see how under conditions existing today there can be any replacement of existing vessels by private owners without Government credit. When so many of our private businesses have had to resort to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the credit that is their lifeblood in time of depression; when the farmers need farm loans and credits; when the householder must seek the aid of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, how could private funds be secured for investment in shipping, which of all our businesses is most susceptible to ruinous foreign competition?

Various plans have been proposed, the essence of which was to eliminate the construction-loan fund. Analysis of these plans by your committee disclosed that each of them contemplated the investment of as much or more of Government funds in new ships as is proposed by retaining the construction-loan fund, and that other and wholly undesirable features were included.

The essence of the President's message is that no subterfuge shall be tolerated, and your committee is entirely in agreement. We propose that our intention to place the American shipowner on a parity with the foreigner be called a subsidy, and that our intention to supply credit for the construction of ships be called a loan, and not camouflaged as deferred purchase money or used to build ships for charter.

The construction-loan fund today is not in a depleted condition. While a few borrowers are behind in payments of interest or principal, others have anticipated their payments to an extent in excess of the amount the few are in arrears. It is safe to say that few, if any, of our banks can boast of such a showing as this in view of the depression through which we are passing.

Title VII, section 701, transfers to the maritime authority all regulatory power now exercised by the Department of Commerce through the Shipping Board Bureau under the various shipping acts.

This section also amends the substantive part of existing regulatory law by extending the provisions of the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, to all the common carriers by water in interstate commerce who are at the present time subject to the jurisdiction of the Shipping Board Bureau. Inasmuch as the intercoastal act has been interpreted to give the regulatory body power to condemn rates as being unreasonably low without giving it corrective power to prescribe minimum rates, the intercoastal shipping act is itself amended specifically to give the authority the power to fix minimum rates. The provision in the original act prohibiting the fixing of specific rates is retained, however.

The majority of common carriers engaged in our intercoastal and coastwise trades appear to be in favor of vesting the regulatory body with such additional powers. No carriers or other persons not already subject to the regulatory jurisdiction will be affected by these amendments.

Paragraph 3 of section 701 amends section 19 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920. This section as amended would permit the regulatory authority to prescribe minimum rates in our export trade whenever the regulatory body found that conditions unfavorable to shipping in our foreign trade exist because of unfair methods of competition employed by foreign-flag carriers.

There is no question about these unfair competitive rates. I said a little while ago that a great manufacturer of automobiles employs a line under a foreign flag to carry his merchandise to the Far East because there is a standing offer on the part of that concern to cut 10 percent under any price that may be offered by any American or other company.

Nearly all the American-flag carriers in our foreign commerce and a large number of foreign-flag carriers have advocated legislation of this type in order to prevent destructive competition. One of the vices which such a provision is expected to remove is the practice of a small minority of carriers of quoting rates at a fixed percentage under the rates of the lines regularly established in our foreign trades. This proposed provision also has an important bearing on the subsidy legislation. Unless some such provision is in the law, in all probability foreign governments will secretly give additional subsidies to their lines to an extent which will enable them to carry our cargo at rates lower than the American-flag carriers can afford to, thus defeating the purposes of our own subsidy.

Another provision in the bill is a prohibition against misbilling and misclassification by shippers and brokers. This provision is substantially the same as the prohibition against misbilling and misclassification by shippers over railroads.

Title VIII insures American officers and crews on American vessels, the establishment of training schools for seamen and for the founding of a Merchant Marine Academy for the training of American officers. It also stipulates a three-watch system, hours of labor, and the issuance of a service book to each sailor containing his record at sea.

Title IX defines administrative powers.

Title X establishes limitation as to shipowner's liability on terms somewhat comparable with the present British law.

This is a matter of great concern to us because of the Morro Castle and Mohawk disasters and the great loss of life. In the Morro Castle disaster that there was only $20,000 left that could be used in any way whatever to recompense for losses incurred as a result of the accident. We are determined that in this measure there shall be provision made so there will be protection and no longer will any such outrages result as occurred in connection with the Morro Castle disaster.

Title XI relates principally to appropriations and the requisition of vessels by the Government in times of national emergency.

A careful consideration of this bill indicates that it represents a certain and rational method of extending proper aid to the American merchant marine insuring its growth and prosperity.

It embodies the principle of offsetting the handicaps to our shipping caused by our present laws and our American standards of living and by the subsidies our foreign compeitors have adopted.

In other words, what we seek to do in placing our shipowner on a parity with his competitors is to make to him the same proposition that is open to him if he wished to become a foreign steamship company, built his ships in a foreign country and operate them under the foreign flag.

It is only in the unusual cases covered by section 512 of the bill that we go further in extending aid to our shipping and this form of aid is only open in exceptional cases, when the operating subsidy provisions of part II, title V, are shown to be inadequate. In situations where an operator needs assistance in developing our commerce in new fields or where his foreign competition is so firmly intrenched that mere equalization of certain costs would be inadequate during the pioneering period, this provision may well mean the saving of some of our weaker, less well-established lines. Were we to limit our aid in all cases to placing our shipowner on a parity with the foreigner would be to assume that in all cases the foreigner is making enough money to operate. This we know is not always the case. The recent adjustments and reorganizations of British shipping companies, sensational court trials, and new British subsidy plan show beyond a doubt that even that nation, old and wise as she is in the ways of shipping is facing her problems in the attempt to retain her position on the seas.

Section 512 is the only flexibility in our plan, and it is no more attractive to the shipowner than to the Government. The profits of a line operating under this plan are limited to 4 percent on its actual investment, and salaries of its officers are also limited. Surely an incentive to the lines whose struggle for existence can only be continued under this plan to remain under it as temporarily as possible.

A study of the methods adopted by our competitors would seem to indicate their intention is to create an advantage in favor of their shipping. Compared with their plans, our methods as outlined should be open to no objection.

In conclusion, let me say that the question has arisen as to the probabilities of mounting cost of ship subsidies. We need not worry on that score. The fluctuations of foreign exchange since our departure from the gold standard have been largely in favor of reducing both operating and construction differentials—particularly construction differentials—and this act will give our Government the benefit of that condition.

It is the belief of the committee that the enactment of this bill into the law will accomplish a number of desirable things. To capitulate briefly, it is hoped it will do the following:

First. It will furnish immediate employment to thousands of American workmen.

Second. It will keep intact American standards of living on American vessels.

Third. In times of emergency abroad it insures the transportation of our farm products and manufactured goods to the world markets under the American flag.

Fourth. It gives to the Navy speedy auxiliaries sufficient to keep our fleets supplied with rations, munitions, and supplies in the event of a national emergency.

Fifth. It supplies schools wherein American citizens may fit themselves to become competent officers and seamen so that our ships may be manned by Americans.

Sixth. Its policy of replacement, wisely developed, will eventually create a merchant marine covering every great trade route with ships of such type, speed, and size as are best adapted to the requirements.

Seventh. It will give confidence to our farmers and manufacturers through the knowledge that their products can be carried abroad at all times and under all conditions at fair and impartial rates.

Eighth. It will encourage American shippers to forward their goods in American bottoms, and American tourists to sail in American ships.

Ninth. It should insure a rapid expansion of our foreign trade, thus enabling a certain disposition of our farm products and manufactured articles.

Tenth. It is a challenge to foreign influence, insidiously at work to prevent the upbuilding of an American merchant marine.

Eleventh. It is a stimulus to the little fellow, to every American citizen who desires to enter into the business of operating American ships in the foreign trade.

Twelfth. It will prevent foreign-owned ships from competing for our overseas business by the adoption of ruinous freight rates.

We pray and have faith to believe that through this act the United States will again assume the sea power that it once held and which its greatness among the nations entitles it to hold.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say at the moment in connection with the bill. I realize there is opposition—and strong opposition—to its passage. My attention has been called to the fact that in the House, where the bill passed this morning, there were 194 yeas and 186 nays. Nevertheless the bill did pass the House. I believe it will pass the Senate. I am not so foolish as to think it would pass the Senate today if I were to ask for a vote upon it; it will take a little time to think about the bill and to reach conclusions on the part of each individual Senator. I am confident that when Senators understand what we have in mind and what the President had in mind in his message, favorable action will be had.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I desire to correct what may be assumed to have been a statement made without foundation.

In the colloquy a moment ago about the cost to the Government of one of these $10,000,000 ships, it was suggested that the shipowner might get $14,000,000 out of the ship. It is hardly fair to state the matter in that way.

If, out of the $10,000,000 cost of a ship, the United States Government should advance $7,000,000, and then take the ship back in the event of war as a brand-new ship, it is true that the shipowner would not profit to the tune of $14,000,000, because presumptively the first $7,000,000 would be paid to an American shipyard that built the ship that cost $10,000,000 to build. Obviously, however, when a man may borrow three-fourths of his part of the cost of the ship, so that in that type of ship he would have only a $750,000 investment, on that type of investment in the event of the seizure of a ship for war purposes a man would make $7,000,000 profit, which would go to him when the Government bought the ship back at $10,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. If course, I do not agree to that. But with proper language the matter can be safeguarded.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on Senate bill 1958, the report having been submitted by me yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 9, 23, 24, 25.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment, insert the following:

"SECTION 1. The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce.

"The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of commerce, and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions, by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries.

"Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to insure to employees the full benefit of their right to self-organization and to collective bargaining, and otherwise to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof."

And the House agree to the same.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the report be adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts advise the Senate what changes have been made?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the conference agreement accepted most of the House amendments as constituting merely formal corrections in the citations of the various statutes and other minor changes of phrases and definitions.

House amendment no. 23 inserted a new section providing that "nothing in this act shall abridge the freedom of speech, or of the press, as guaranteed in the first amendment to the Constitution." The conference agreement rejected this amendment as having no proper place in the bill. There is no reason why the Congress should single out this provision of the Constitution for special affirmation. The amendment could not possibly have had any legal effect, because it was merely a restatement of the first amendment to the Constitution, which remains the law of the land irrespective of Congressional declaration.

House amendment no. 11, which redrafted section 9 (b), embodied two changes from the Senate bill. The first change undertook to express more explicitly the standards by which the Board is to be guided in deciding what is an appropriate bargaining unit. The conference agreement accepts this part of the amendment. The amendment also added a proviso designed to limit the otherwise broad connotation that might be put upon the phrase "or other unit." The proviso, however, was subject to some misconstructions, and the conferees have agreed that the simplest way to deal with the matter is to strike out the undefined phrase "other unit." It was also agreed to insert after "plant unit" the phrase "or subdivision thereof." This was done because the National Labor Relations Board has frequently had occasion to order an election in a unit not as broad as "employer unit", yet not necessarily coincident with the phrases "craft unit" or "plant unit"; for example, the "production and maintenance employees" of a given plant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting upon its amendment to the title of the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the title of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. TYDINGS. I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following action of the House of Representatives, which was read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
June 27, 1935.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 35, and 39 to the bill (H. R. 8021) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, and concur therein; and

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32 to said bill, and request a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments numbered 3 to 10, inclusive, and 12 to 32, inclusive, agree to the further conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate. I will state that I have suggested that the same conferees be appointed as were originally appointed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

RIVERS AND HARBORS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pending motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2582, the so-called "merchant-marine bill", and in its stead I ask that House bill 6732, the rivers and harbors bill, be now considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York withdraws the pending motion and asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senate would object to adopting the amendments en bloc? There have been hearings upon them. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendments reported by the committee be agreed to en bloc. Is there objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, that is perfectly satisfactory to me, with one exception. The Senator from New York will recall that among the other projects was one at Muskegon which was included subject to the ultimate approval of the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers. Since then the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers have passed favorably upon the project; and I have a letter from General Markham recommending that instead of the language used respecting the Muskegon project a definite statement be inserted reading as follows:

Muskegon Harbor, Mich.: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated June 21, 1935.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan with the new language recommended by the Army engineers.

In every instance in this bill the projects which are included have been passed upon by the Army engineers. The only matters which have not been passed upon by them are requests for surveys. It has been the universal practice that they should be granted without question.

This bill, of course, is merely an authorization. It does not actually appropriate the money, but it seeks to cover those matters which have engaged the attention of the Army engineers and have been duly reported to the Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have just been informed that the Senate is considering what is known as the "river and harbor bill." I have been handed a copy of the bill, and I discover that it contains 57 pages and deals with hundreds of projects. Not being a member of the committee and having had no opportunity to examine the bill or the report, I shall be glad to have the chairman of the committee inform me, first, what is the aggregate amount of the appropriations carried in the bill; second, the total amount of authorizations so far as they are susceptible of ascertainment; third, what will be the cost of making the surveys provided for in the bill; and, fourth, what will be the cost of carrying into effect the projects which, after surveys are made, will be adopted. I know that the information, particularly with respect to the last suggestion, will be difficult to obtain; indeed, perhaps, only a guess can be made with respect to the entire cost of executing the projects which may be agreed upon.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that no appropriations at all are carried in the bill.

Mr. KING. None at all?

Mr. COPELAND. No, Mr. President. These are authorizations. Then from time to time the Army engineers come before the Appropriations Committee to ask for money to carry out the various authorizations. These are authorizations which have been considered by the Army engineers, and have been passed upon by the Commerce Committee after prolonged hearings, and all parties concerned have been heard. So in no sense is this an appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, since I have been in the Senate I have had occasion to examine river and harbor bills carrying millions of dollars of appropriations; indeed, in the aggregate they have carried hundreds of millions of dollars. My examinations led me to believe that many of the items were wholly unwarranted and that the appropriations in the aggregate were entirely too large. Believing as I was forced to believe, from the information which had come to me, that many of the appropriations for rivers and harbors were improper, I determined to make a careful examination of appropriations which had been made from the beginning of the Republic. Accordingly, 8 or 10 years ago I obtained all of the reports and data that were available and examined all of the projects concerning which data were available, in order to satisfy myself as to the merits of the various projects upon which appropriations had been made and the wisdom of continuing the hit-and-miss policy which had been adopted in dealing with rivers and harbors.

It took several weeks to assemble the data and to examine all of the material available concerning the appropriations which had been made for the purposes indicated. I found that considerably more than a billion dollars had been expended and that a considerable portion of the same had been wasted upon waterways, bayous, swamps, and streams that had never been utilized to carry freight or commerce of any kind and could not be made serviceable for commercial or other purposes. Little streams were made the excuse for obtaining appropriations from the Government, and upon insignificant rivulets and creeks thousands of dollars were expended. Indeed, the aggregate expended upon the character of streams, bayous, and creeks to which I am referring amounted to tens of millions of dollars.

I discovered that upon many of these so-called "waterways", after large sums had been expended for their development, no freight was carried; upon some of them a few tons of rock or gravel were transported and upon the others a few logs or some brush were floated for short distances.

I recall that in one State, where $10,000,000 had been appropriated upon a project ostensibly needed for the transportation of freight, it had scarcely ever been utilized, and, when I mentioned the matter in the Senate, one of the Senators from that State arose and declared that it had never been of any benefit, and probably never would prove of any benefit or advantage to the State or its inhabitants.

Mr. President, I reached the conclusion, after a most thorough investigation, that nearly one-half of all the appropriations made had proven of but little, if any, value. I do not mean to convey the idea there should not be appropriations made for the improvement of our harbors and for the development of some of our waterways. In this connection, though, it is not improper to state that there have been expended upon the Missouri, Mississippi, and Ohio Rivers hundreds of millions of dollars, and, generally speaking, I think the freight and cargoes carried upon these streams amount in tonnage to less than that which was carried back in the days of Mark Twain. We read that 6 to 10 decades ago there were many boats upon the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and that they carried a large number of passengers and a considerable volume of freight.

But as appropriations were made and millions expended for the improvement of these streams, there was a reduction in the amount of freight carried and in the number of passengers who availed themselves of water transportation facilities. As a matter of fact, many of the boats that carried passengers and freight became obsolete and were not replaced, and these great waterways became less and less important for transportation purposes.

Mr. President, a hasty glance at the 57 pages contained in the bill before us leads me to the conviction that many of the projects for which surveys are to be made are unworthy of Federal consideration and entirely lacking in merit. As I have objected to various measures carrying millions for so-called "rivers and harbors" I am unwilling to give my support to the bill now under consideration.

I inquire of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] whether these numerous items and projects have received the attention of members of his committee, and whether the evidence submitted is sufficient to justify authorization for surveys, because, as Senators know, these surveys cost money; and I also inquire whether or not there was evidence adduced justifying a continuation of projects which heretofore may have been authorized.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think I may say to the Senator that no silly and impossible and improper surveys have been asked for. I have a great deal of sympathy for what the Senator says about the bill in general. I always have felt that way about it, and I feel more that way now, having been through it; yet these various surveys go to the Board of Army Engineers. If there is absolutely no justification for the expenditure of a dollar in a survey, they simply do not make it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the examinations which I have made of reports submitted in behalf of the hundreds and hundreds of projects upon which Federal moneys have been expended I have found that in many instances chambers of commerce, organizations of citizens, various civic and other clubs made representations to Congress as to the vital importance of appropriations for the development of projects within their States; and I discovered that many of these projects were of the insignificant and unimportant character that I have described; that they related to little brooks and streams and bayous and, in some instances, the evidence showed that the streams were so small that they could not support boats capable of carrying persons or commodities.

As I recall, the survey showed that one of the projects had so little water that it was recommended that artesian wells be drilled in order to supplement the wholly inadequate amount of water found in the stream. Yet this project found a place in the great river and harbor appropriations bill.

The result of those representations was, that not infrequently projects were adopted upon which were expended—or rather I should say, wasted—large sums taken from the Federal Treasury.

I recall that upon one occasion, when an appropriation for rivers and harbors was under consideration, there appeared an appropriation for a stream in New Jersey. Immediately one of the Senators from that State arose and said that he had never heard of such a creek or stream and, as I recall, he stated he did not ask for an appropriation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Sentor yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there is use for surveys running to a totally different net result than that he has described. For example, the committee has inserted provision in the bill for one survey at my request which has for its purpose the development of an authentic opinion that a project is not worth while, so that I can use it authentically in rebutting the precise kind of propaganda the Senator is discussing. This great array of surveys in the bill, more often than not, in my judgment, will result in the condemnation and the stopping of projects rather than in their encouragement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to commend my friend the Senator from Michigan for suggesting or supporting the provision of the bill which he refers to. I have no doubt that if such a plan shall be carried into effect hundreds of these so-called "projects" calling for river and harbor appropriations will be abandoned and hundreds more for which appropriations have been solicited will never be entered upon.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator need not be disturbed by the supposed expense of making surveys. Most of them can be made from data already in the office of the Chief of Engineers, and it will not be necessary to send out people actually to make the physical surveys. They have the data already in hand.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan whether his suggestion and his amendment will call for a reexamination of many of these projects which have been surveyed and upon the construction of which the Government has entered?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Frequently the items call for a resurvey of existing information in order to bring it down to date. My experience with surveys has been rather general, because Michigan has a longer water line than any other State in the Union, and we have a very large interest in water projects. My experience has been that surveys more often result in condemnation of projects by the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers than in their approval.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, referring to the statement made by the Senator from Florida I concede that data have been accumulated relating to some streams and with respect to some harbors which will enable the engineers, without additional surveys, to make recommendations, but the data obtained were not spontaneously generated and the facts and statements and the information available resulted from surveys and explorations made by Army engineers or persons representing the Government. I concede also, as stated by the Senator from Michigan, that the Army engineers, upon making surveys, and after making investigations, have made some adverse recommendations. I also discovered in my investigations that in some cases where the engineers had made adverse reports persistent efforts were made to secure further examinations and surveys, and the result was that the first reports were modified and in some instances entirely overruled.

Notwithstanding the adverse reports which from time to time were submitted there are hundreds of projects which were approved and upon which, as I have stated—and I ask pardon for repeating—hundreds of millions of dollars were expended, no small part of which was an absolute waste.

The bill before us authorizes investigations of a large number of projects. Since I came into the Chamber I have hastily glanced at the pages of the bill and at the projects referred to, and they number more than 475.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I ought to pay just a brief tribute to the Army engineers. I have found them beyond influence. Even when I have gone to them as Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, I have found, in the language of the street, that they are "from Missouri." It is very difficult—I think impossible—to delude or mislead the Army engineers. They are most rigid. They have stood up and in my presence opposed Members of Congress time and again who wanted pet projects adopted, but the engineers refused to yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York whether it is his desire to have the Senate finally act upon the bill this afternoon?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. In addition to the amendments which are printed in the bill——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, have those amendments been agreed to?

Mr. COPELAND. Not as yet. In addition to those amendments, I send a number of other amendments to the desk, which I desire to have stated and acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments submitted by the Senator from New York.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "and Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 60, Seventy-fourth Congress."

On page 8, between lines 6 and 7, to insert the following paragraph:

Twitch Cove and Big Thoroughfare River, Md.; Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 67, Seventy-fourth Congress.

On page 6, line 24, it is proposed to strike out the word "document" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "documents", and after the word "Congress", at the end of line 24, to insert a comma and the words "and 66, Seventy-fourth Congress"; and on page 17, line 3, to strike out the words "Document No. 13, Seventy-fourth Congress" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Documents Nos. 13 and 63, Seventy-fourth Congress."

Mr. COPELAND. It is desired that the language regarding Muskegon Harbor, Mich., be changed as I indicated in the language I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment proposed on page 22, after line 23, it is proposed to insert the following:

Muskegon Harbor, Mich., report of the Chief of Engineers dated June 21, 1935.

On page 46, after line 17, it is proposed to insert a paragraph, as follows:

Waterway from Offatts Bayou to San Louis Pass, Galveston Island, Tex.

On page 3, between lines 14 and 15, it is proposed to insert the following:

Vineyard Harbor, Mass., Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 65, Seventy-fourth Congress.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Texas to ascertain whether this is the same language we have used.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, after line 17, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

Waterway from Offatts Bayou to San Louis Pass, Galveston Island, Tex.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, that is the same as the language read a few moments ago.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 3, to change the section number from 9 to 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 34, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

Stonington Harbor, Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 34, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

Bagaduce River, Maine.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, is that for a survey?

Mr. WHITE. A survey; yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] a question. Is this the survey of a river?

Mr. WHITE. This is the survey of a stream; yes. Bagaduce River.

Mr. KING. Where is it?

Mr. WHITE. It is a small stream, and it is a question as to whether the improvement of the navigation of it is justified. This is an amendment which was offered in the House too late to be considered there, and I have introduced it at the request of one of the Members of the House. All it asks is the authority for a survey.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator kindly advise this waiting body of Senators how much tonnage is now carried upon the majestic waters of this mighty river?

Mr. WHITE. As the body is waiting I should not want to undertake that task. It is a small stream, and a small volume of traffic moves on it. I cannot give the Senator the absolute figures, but I freely concede that it is a small matter. I thought that might commend itself to the Senator, and I ask that the Board of Engineers may make such study as they think proper and make such report as they deem proper.

Mr. KING. What part of the State is it located in?

Mr. WHITE. It is in the eastern portion of the State.

Mr. KING. Is it near this Passamaquoddy Bay upon which $20,000,000 is to be expended to harness the tides?

Mr. WHITE. It has no relation to that at all.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator please advise us what factories and other industries are upon the stream and what benefits will result to them and to the public? Will transportation rates be reduced? Will power be developed? Or is this just a project upon which to expend public funds?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I understood the amendment had been adopted.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error; it has not been adopted.

Mr. WHITE. I do not have my notes immediately at hand. I will ask, if the Senator insists upon it, that the matter may go over temporarily in order that I may look through my notes, and then I will undertake to enlighten the Senator in detail.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not desire the Senator to appeal to his conscience by looking at his notes, because I am sure that if he looked at them he would find nothing that would throw any enlightenment upon this grave and very important question under consideration by the Senate.

May I say in all seriousness, Mr. President, that this item and others in the bill are a vindication, in my opinion, of the criticisms which I have made upon bills of this character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? There is a great deal of confusion in the Chamber. The Chair asks that Senators may be in order and that the occupants of the galleries refrain from conversation.

Mr. KING. May I say by way of parenthesis that perhaps other amendments are being prepared to offer so that other brooks and streams may secure appropriations, and the bill be further loaded with authorizations for surveys which will ripen into executed projects in order to increase the transportation facilities of the "teeming" business interests of their respective districts, which demand water transportation.

Seriously, however, Mr. President, some of these measures——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator mean to intimate that there is any teeming on rivers?

Mr. KING. No; nor any freighting boat, except perhaps now and then a little brush or a few logs upon many of these Federal projects. That reminds me that in many of the records and reports I have read, there would appear a note that the preceding year there were two or three gravel loads hauled upon boats or barges, or that a few logs and a number of trees were floated down streams.

Coming again to what I was attempting to state, Mr. President, the amendments which are offered to this bill, and amendments which have been offered to many previous bills, illustrate the unwisdom of the course which is being pursued in the matter of expending money for rivers and harbors.

Mr. President, a board should be created to deal with the development and improvement of our inland waterways and with our harbors. They should upon examination determine what surveys should be made and what moneys should be expended for their improvement. They should then recommend to Congress such appropriations as in their judgment the facts warrant. But I repeat, we have squandered many millions of dollars carried in river and harbor bills, and it looks as though we are to continue this injudicious, unwise, unsound, and wasteful course to the end of time.

We have just passed a bill continuing the nuisance taxes for 2 years. The American people are burdened with heavy taxes, and they are to be increased. The House Committee on Ways and Means is now considering another tax measure which will add several hundred millions of dollars annually to the tax burdens of the American people. Enormous appropriations are being made, and demands for still greater appropriations are being pressed upon Congress. No one can tell what the total appropriations will be voted during this session of Congress. That it will exceed by three or four or five billions of dollars the enormous amounts which we shall wring from the people by taxation I think will be admitted.

We are upon a spending spree now. We are, to use the language recently found in an article in the Saturday Evening Post, "the spendingest Congress our Government has ever experienced, except during the World War. Pay day will come. Perhaps there will be demands for repudiation, or for the issue of unlimited irredeemable paper money, in order to meet these growing and mounting expenditures. I think the time has come when we should call a halt and demand economy. I believe the most popular message President Roosevelt ever sent to Congress, and the one which commanded the support of leading Republicans as well as the rank and file of the Republican Party, was the one in which he demanded economy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I agree with the Senator's description of the President's message on economy, but I remind him that the economy itself did not last any longer than the Presidential arrangement during the past week in connection with the tax bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the able Senator cannot expect me to assent to the entire statement which he has just made.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I expect the Senator to assent to all of it because he is an honest man.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator for his estimate of my character. I will say, however, that I am not pleased with the enormous appropriations that are being made, and with some of the legislation which has the support of both branches of Congress. I am a Democrat and endeavor to support Democratic principles—one of which has called for economy in Government—that the burdens of the people may be lightened. I have always pleaded for economy. I have voted against scores of measures, since I have been in the Senate and have condemned policies which I regarded as violations of the Constitution and injurious to the people. And I expect, while I remain in the Senate, to oppose and vote against other measures which I shall regard as against the best interests of the American people.

I think the time has come when we should scrutinize more carefully the bills brought to our attention. I confess that I do not like to have handed to committees by some of the "brain trusters" and other executive officials measures which it is expected must receive the speedy approval of Congress. I sometimes think that we are abdicating responsibilities and duties—heavy and solemn responsibilities—resting upon us, in permitting executive agencies and organizations and departments to formulate governmental policies and frame proposed legislation.

Under the Constitution the three departments of the Government are separate and distinct. There should be no coalition, no compounding of them. The executive department's duty is to execute the law and the judicial department's duty to interpret it.

The legislative branch has a distinct and vital part to play in our political system. Many persons believe that the line of separation between the coordinate branches of the Government are being destroyed and that the checks and balances provided in the Constitution are being ignored.

Attacks upon the Constitution should be repulsed. There is no condition or emergency which justifies the wrecking or destruction of the noble fabric of government erected by the fathers of the Republic.

Mr. President, I arise only to submit a few remarks concerning rivers and harbors bills and to protest against the policy which we have pursued in dealing with a question of great importance to the country.

I wish to challenge attention again to the economy message of the President of the United States and to conjure Senators to respect the spirit of that message and to carry it into the measures that may come before us for consideration.

Mr. WHEELER. I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, after line 26, it is proposed to insert the following new paragraph:

Missouri River, completion of improvement from mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, and construction of Fort Peck Dam; House Document No. 238, Seventy-third Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 44, after line 3, it is proposed to add:

waterway from Charleston, S. C., to Columbia, S. C.

Mr. BYRNES. That comes under the paragraph providing merely for surveys.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, after line 24, it is proposed to insert the following:

Channel from Back River to the public landing in Wallace Creek, Elizabeth City County, Va.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. On behalf of the committee I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

Mississippi River between Missouri River and Minneapolis; House Document No. 137, Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Minnesota if the more than $500,000,000 which we have appropriated for the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers have not accomplished all the changes that are required in order to complete that very important part of our water transportation system?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator, I think, is misinformed about the amount being $500,000,000 as having been expended on the Mississippi River.

Mr. KING. No; I beg the Senator's pardon, I am not. That amount has been expended on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. However, it makes no difference; if it were a billion dollars it would not change the result, I know.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There has been expended something like $80,000,000 on the Mississippi. As to the Missouri, I am not sure what has been appropriated, but it has been something like $15,000,000, I think.

Mr. KING. But this is necessary in order to complete the important work which has been done upon the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers in order to make them the great arteries for the transportation of trade and commerce?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. At the appropriate place in the bill providing for surveys, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 48, after line 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

Channels in the harbors at Washington Island, Door County, Wis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. So far as I know, there are no other amendments to be proposed to the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was passed. I have just conferred with the chairman of the committee, who informs me he has no objection. There is another matter, respecting the Boulder Dam and the Colorado River, which may affect the upper basin, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] and myself want to have opportunity to inquire into it, because we knew nothing about this.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, is this the matter relating to the Boulder Dam?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is very much interested in it. Would the Senator be willing to withhold his motion so that I might ascertain whether the Senator from California would like to be present?

Mr. KING. I am just entering the motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the Senator had made a motion.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. This matter which went into the river and harbor bill was taken up on the floor of the Senate and discussed by some and adopted by the Senate. To facilitate matters so that there would be no delay, it was put into this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion in this connection, let me say that the question is now in controversy in the House, not because of the matter in which the Senator from California is interested, not by reason of the matter in which the Senator from Oregon is interested, but by reason of an amendment which does not affect them. The amendment adopted was based upon the statement that certain work had been done upon two projects, one in Oregon and one in California, and that there was some question as to the authorization for it; and the bill was passed in order to give such authority.

There was added to this a direct authorization for a new project upon the Colorado River, which is not under construction, and some of us from what are known as the upper basin States are apprehensive lest it involves the initiation of new water rights and new appropriations which were not within the scope of the request of the Senators from California and Oregon.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume the Senator from Utah wishes to enter a motion to reconsider?

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President. It is not done for the purpose of any delay at all, but when a measure affects our States so vitally we feel constrained to enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is giving notice of his intention to make a motion to reconsider?

Mr. KING. Yes; and I shall ask that on Monday morning the matter be taken up.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator enters the motion to reconsider?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But he does not ask to have it taken up now?

Mr. KING. No.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my attention has been called by the clerk to House bill 5809, Calendar No. 987, to amend an act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia." It is a House bill which came to the Senate and was passed on the 25th instant.

I enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill for the purpose of subsequently offering an amendment to correct an error in the House text, the word "code" being used instead of the word "each."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The Senator from Utah enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 5809 was passed.

Mr. KING. Now I move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the House be requested to return the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION TAX PROGRAM

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate some matters which it seems to me might be interesting at this particular time as we approach another week end and also the end of 6 months of the present session of Congress. I have before me the message of the President, sent to the Senate today, in which, in his opening sentence, he used this language:

> Before the termination of this session of the Congress I believe that it is important that definite action be taken—

And so on. Action is important because he wants to withdraw the right of holders of gold-clause bonds to sue the United States.

In connection with the message delivered to the Senate this morning, I desire to call attention to another message sent to the Senate on June 19, a week ago yesterday, and in doing so I remind the Senate of what has happened since that message was delivered to the Senate. There was no such opening phrase in that message as is contained in the one received this morning, and it seems to me no reasonable person could read it and receive the distinct impression that the President demanded action at this session of the Congress.

It is true that in one place he says:

> These complicated and difficult questions cannot adequately be debated in the time remaining in the present session of this Congress.

It may be construed that that language applies to some of the proposals that are not included in the three particular tax suggestions he specifies. But he continues:

> In my Budget message of January 7, I recommended that the Congress extend the miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes which are about to expire and also to maintain the current rates of those taxes which, under the present law, would be reduced. I said then that I considered such taxes necessary to the financing of the Budget for 1936. I am gratified that the Congress is taking action on this recommendation.

There is no language here which indicates that the President expected the Congress to take action upon his recommendation at this session of Congress.

I merely make mention of these matters, Mr. President, for the purpose of directing attention to what has happened since that message came here, and it seems to me it justifies the conclusion that the Congress ought to adjourn just as quickly as it is possible for it to do so, regardless of the "must" legislation which has been sent to the Congress. It seems to me it is not too much to say that the Congress is tired, sick, sore, and in confusion; and, if that be true, it is certainly not the time to undertake to pass legislation, permanent in character, which is not immediately required to meet the demands of the Government.

Of course, the President would be required, in my judgment, under the Constitution, it would become his duty, to insist upon the Congress remaining here sufficiently long, or if it should adjourn, to insist upon the Congress convening in special session in order to meet the necessary financial demands of the Government. Some may get the impression that the message sent to us on June 19 was for that purpose. It may very well be argued—no one would contend otherwise, so far as I know—that the present administration has put the Government in such a position with respect to its finances that there can be no dispute as to the importance of calling upon Congress at any time to meet the demands of the Government in the matter of its finances; but we must bear in mind that in January, when the President appeared before the joint session of the Congress and delivered his annual message, he called our attention to the fact that it was not expected that any legislation would be required at this session with respect to taxation, except the continuation of the so-called "nuisance" taxes for a short period of time.

So, during all these 6 months, in all the legislation we have passed, requiring the appropriation of great sums of money, we have proceeded upon the assurance of the President that what he was recommending was well within the credit of the Federal Government. Taking the message delivered to us on January 4, we had a right to assume that we would not be called upon to pass any tax legislation at this session of the Congress.

Mr. President, I should not particularly complain if the President changed his mind in that respect; indeed, I think the sooner the President changes his mind with respect to taxation to meet the great financial demands he has placed upon the Government the sooner the condition of the country will be improved and the safer the Nation will be; but I call attention to the unfairness, if I may be permitted to use that word, of sending to a tired Congress a message like that of June 19, which does not have for its purpose the raising of revenue for the Government, but has for its principal purpose some sort of social reform in this country of ours.

For the purpose of demonstrating to those who are so greatly interested in the particular kind of taxations recommended by the President, I invite attention to certain extracts from that message in order that I may show definitely and conclusively that the President's principal purpose was some kind of social reform rather than the raising of revenue to meet the demands of the Federal Government.

O Mr. President, that must be true, because as late as yesterday and the few days preceding—and I shall discuss that in a few moments—the President was calling upon the Congress in considering a joint resolution which imposes the large sum of $500,000,000 in the form of a sales tax upon the poor people of the Nation, to add on the wealth of the Nation a tax which would amount to $340,000,000, $200,000,000 of which was to come from inheritance taxes and was to go to reduce the debt of the Nation, and $140,000,000 to be added in order to help balance the Budget.

Let me call attention to those words in order that I may demonstrate at this late day, at almost the end of 6 months of the present session, that the President is calling upon a tired Congress, not to pass a bill which is necessary to meet the Government's demands, but to pass a bill that will bring forth the social reform which he has in his mind and which he has had in it for a long time. I read:

> The transmission from generation to generation of vast fortunes by will, inheritance, or gift, is not consistent with the ideals and sentiments of the American people.

Then further:

> Great accumulations of wealth cannot be justified on the basis of personal and family security. In the last analysis such accumulations amount to the perpetuation of great and undesirable concentration of control in a relatively few individuals over the employment and welfare of many, many others.
> Such inherited economic power is as inconsistent with the ideals of this generation as inherited political power was inconsistent with the ideals of the generation which established our Government.

Further along he said:

> A tax upon inherited economic power is a tax upon static wealth, not upon that dynamic wealth which makes for the healthy diffusion of economic good.

A little later he said:

> Because of the basis on which this proposed tax is to be levied and also because of the very sound public policy of encouraging a wider distribution of wealth, I strongly urge that the proceeds of this tax should be specifically segregated and applied, as they accrue, to the reduction of the national debt. By so doing we shall progressively lighten the tax burden of the average taxpayer, and, incidentally, assist in our approach to a balanced budget.

Further along in the second item of taxation he said:

> The disturbing effects upon our national life that come from great inheritances of wealth and power can in the future be reduced, not only through the method I have just described, but through a definite increase in the taxes now levied upon very great individual net incomes.

Then in a third paragraph he said:

> Social unrest and a deepening sense of unfairness are dangers to our national life which we must minimize by rigorous methods. People know that vast personal incomes come not only through the effort or ability or luck of those who receive them, but also because of the opportunities for advantage which government itself contributes. Therefore the duty rests upon the Government to restrict such incomes by very high taxes.

Mr. President, when I read that message, or heard it read in the Senate, it did not occur to me that the Congress was supposed to take any action upon the message at this session. I assumed it was a political gesture intended to offset the great public alarm and the very great interest in the share-the-wealth movement which is so evident in our country. I assumed this was intended to offset that idea popular among many of the people of the United States, because I could not conceive that the President, at the end of almost 6 months of this session of Congress, would propose to the Congress a scheme which was almost wholly social in character, one which would require all kinds of discussion and debate before we could reach a definite conclusion upon it.

I do not say that with respect to the mere extension of the taxes to other groups of persons, to the wealthy or what not. It is not that about which I complain. If it were that, I should be ready, as many others are, to sit down and see how we could work it out. That time is coming, and we know when it comes that the wealthy people must bear a greater share of the burden; but we also know that every individual and every class must bear a part of that burden. So I did not assume we would take up that matter at this particular session.

What happened? I invite attention to this fact because I think it is important. That message was delivered on Wednesday. There was some difference of opinion as to whether anything should be done. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a day or two later suggested we ought to act on that program at this session and get rid of it. It seemed to me that was a reasonable position for him to take, because the message involved much in the way of new taxation, and it might very well be argued, late in the session though it was, not to be unreasonable from his point of view to take it up. So I had no particular complaint to make about that.

But because of reports in all the newspapers on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the whole Congress was confused, and the country was confused, because the President had been charged in some quarters with not being sincere in his proposal and with making it as a pure gesture, as I supposed he was doing when he made it.

On Monday there appeared at the White House—of course, at the President's request—the distinguished leaders of both the House and the Senate. But before I come to that, let me call attention to what appeared in the Washington Post on Monday in order that I may verify the statement I have made. There was an interview with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] approving the program. Then this statement was made:

> Both Senator ROBINSON, Democratic leader, and Speaker BYRNS have indicated that they are willing to go ahead with the tax legislation now, but they are waiting for word from the White House before taking any definite steps. On the other hand, there is a feeling that Congress should continue to drive for adjournment, and that more time should be given to study of the proposed legislation than is available at this session. Senator PAT HARRISON, Chairman of the Finance Committee, is of this opinion.

Then there will be found in a newspaper of the next day further comment upon this matter, and I only take the Washington newspapers because they are more convenient. I read from the Washington Post of Tuesday, June 25, this statement, headed:

> PRESIDENT RUSHES TAX PROGRAM—LEADERS SEEK PASSAGE IN 5 DAYS
> So surprising and breath taking was this proposal to rush to enactment within 5 days a tax program about which the country has no knowledge except along broad general lines, that its announcement bewildered observers. The only plausible justification put forward for such action was that the President wished to demonstrate his sincerity in proposing his share-the-wealth tax program Wednesday.
> It was reported that in case the procedure decided on last night encounters difficulties, a new joint resolution would be originated in the House to extend the nuisance taxes from 30 to 90 days to prevent their expiration Sunday midnight and until the broader plan can be enacted. This report added to the bewilderment.
> DOUGHTON DIFFERS
> Chairman ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, of the House Ways and Means Committee, one of those at the White House, however, said he knew nothing of such a proposal and that it was his understanding that an effort would be made to have the pending joint resolution, with the President's program attached, enacted this week.
> "It is up to the Senate, as I understand it," asserted DOUGHTON. "If the Senate does not act by Sunday, I suppose the nuisance taxes will have to lapse."

The plan to act at once on the President's tax plan was revealed by Senator ROBINSON on leaving the White House early last night after a conference of 2 hours and 35 minutes with the President.

"At the conference attended by the Vice President, Speaker BYRNS, Chairman HARRISON of the Senate Finance Committee, Chairman DOUGHTON of the Ways and Means Committee, and Senator ROBINSON," the latter said, dictating to a large group of the press, "it was decided to press for action the recommendations of the President as to the amendments to the tax law at the present session.

"The Chairman of the Finance Committee, Mr. HARRISON, will ask his committee to consider the subject with a view to proposing amendments to the joint resolution extending certain taxes and with a view to adding these amendments to the joint resolution."

Senator ROBINSON declined to make any further statement, and pushed through the crowd of newspapermen to his automobile.

In the same article this appears:

It is known that Chairman DOUGHTON suggested at the White House conference that Congress complete the present "must" program as speedily as possible and take a recess until November, with the Ways and Means Committee in the meanwhile at work formulating a bill to meet the President's objectives.

President Roosevelt, it was reported, summarily rejected this proposal, telling the congressional leaders that such a delay would create doubt as to his sincerity in proposing his share-the-wealth program. He is reported to have insisted that Congress proceed at once to consideration of the proposals.

CONFUSION ON INTENT

The President in his message Wednesday, however, did not indicate whether he wished immediate action on his proposals and this led to the confusion which reached a climax last night. Some congressional leaders argued the program should be adopted at this session and others that it should wait, pending study, until next winter.

* * * * * * *

HARRISON and DOUGHTON, chairmen of the two committee which handle all tax matters, went into the White House conference opposed to attempting enactment of the President's proposals at this session, both contending they would require lengthy hearings and prolonged consideration, thus extending the present session into the autumn.

Speaker BYRNS and ROBINSON, however, favored action before adjournment. The Vice President's views were not known. It is assumed that each of the conferees argued for his viewpoint and that the opponents of immediate action bowed to the President's wishes.

BYRNS took the view that there was no need for lengthy hearings and contended the program could be put into effect and Congress could adjourn by August 1 or not later than August 10. The Speaker favors quick disposition of all major measures pending at this session to pave the way for a short and harmonious session next year, when the entire House is up for reelection.

"We ought to dispose of as much legislation as possible now and give business a chance to know what is ahead of it," he asserted.

The Washington Herald of the same day quotes Representative DOUGHTON as follows:

"We will try to pass the new taxes by Saturday. If we fail in that, we may keep the program before Congress a while, even if we lose $1,500,000 revenue daily. We talked at the White House about a separate resolution to save this revenue, but it wasn't given serious consideration. Later, we may have to adopt some other plan."

An alternative plan, favored by liberals but dropped by the President, called for submission of his tax program to the House in the usual order. This would include deliberate public hearings and threaten an all-summer session of Congress.

Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, largely credited with inspiring the President's decision, earlier announced he had an entire program ready for increasing income taxes in the higher brackets, imposing new and stiff inheritance taxes, and boosting taxes on successful corporations.

* * * * * * *

The President argued with his leaders for nearly 3 hours before they consented to the steam-roller plan. Vice President Garner; Speaker Byrns; Senator Joe T. Robinson, of Arkansas, majority leader; Senator Pat Harrison, of Mississippi, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee; and Representative Doughton, of North Carolina, Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, finally approved it.

DOUBTS "STEAM ROLLER"

On departing from the White House, Senator ROBINSON said:

"At the conference it was decided to press for action on the recommendations of the President as to amendments to the tax laws at the present session.

"The Chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator HARRISON, will ask his committee to consider the subject with a view to proposing amendments to the joint resolution extending certain taxes and with a view to adding the amendments to that resolution."

Mr. HARRISON apparently had some doubts about succeeding with the "steam roller" plan. His comment was:

"Congress won't adjourn until it takes it."

All the newspaper reports are practically to the same effect.

We pass from the morning of that day until the Finance Committee met in the afternoon, at 4 o'clock, at the call of the chairman. The newspapers carried the story that before that meeting was had, the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], met with the Democratic members of the Finance Committee and told them the difficulties they were having at the White House, and urged that they stand by them and help put the new tax bill on the joint resolution extending the nuisance taxes. The members of the committee, however, insisted that there must be an opportunity for hearings. A meeting was called for the next day, yesterday morning, at 10 o'clock, at which time a large membership was present.

Before discussing the meeting on Wednesday morning, however, I desire to call attention to the statements made by the chairman of the committee on the floor of the Senate in response to an inquiry made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

The Senator from Oregon inquired:

Will the Senator kindly outline in a few words what he proposes in the matter of the collection of new revenue?

Mr. HARRISON. As suggested in the President's message, as the Senator realizes, there are three proposals which the President is very anxious to have taken up for consideration at this time. He is very anxious to have them passed on the joint resolution as amendments.

On the next page, in further response to the inquiry by the Senator from Oregon, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] said:

Out of the three proposals the rough estimate, ascertained from my conference this morning with the experts, subject, of course, to revision, is somewhere around $340,000,000.

Those are the three suggestions submitted by the President on which he desires legislation in connection with the joint resolution at this session of Congress.

On the next day, yesterday, when we met, the chairman of the committee explained that the experts had not been able to finish their work, and promptly adjourned the committee subject to the call of the Chair. In the Senate yesterday the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] was interrogated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with respect to this matter; and the Senator from Kentucky insisted that the plan was to add these amendments to the joint resolution, he at that time not having known what the orders were from the White House. Later, he asked that his remarks be expunged from the RECORD; but some Senator objected, and that was not done.

Some time yesterday, while all the Senate was excited about having to take this action suddenly, and about having to get it done this week, before the time for the expiration of the nuisance taxes, right in the midst of it all, with all this confusion, the announcement was made—and the first announcement came from the newspapermen at the White House—that the President had repudiated the whole thing, and asked apparently in surprise, "What do you mean when you talk to me about having these taxes placed upon the joint resolution and passed by the Congress by Saturday night?" All the newspapers carried the story in practically this form:

The President's remarks on taxes came at his regular morning press conference when 1 of the 125 newspapermen on hand asked if the collection on nuisance taxes would halt on Monday in case the joint resolution continuing them and the new tax program attached to them failed to pass by Saturday night.

The President acted as though he had never heard of such a thing, although the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, from the White House steps, said to the country that the agreement had been made, and he said it as he came from the White House. Of course he did not say that the President had agreed to it, but no other construction could be placed upon his statement; and the President as though this were an enirely new thing, and he had never heard of it, said this:

The President's answer was in the form of a question. He asked his inquirer what made him think that a whole new tax bill was going to be passed by Saturday. The original questioner in some surprise asked if the President then did not himself want the tax program to be passed this week.

Mr. Roosevelt said in reply to this query that there had been intimations in a few newspapers that the plan was to put the tax program through by Saturday.

But he added with some show of irritation that he had never said anything to that effect. Go back and look at the record, he suggested. Then someone asked when the program would pass. The President answered that this was in the realm of speculation.

"NO WORD FROM THE WHITE HOUSE"

He returned again to what he held to have been a misinterpretation of his purposes. No word had ever come from the White House, he said, that the program must go through this week. He added that at the White House conference with congressional leaders, Monday night, no one even suggested that they would pass the new tax bill by Saturday.

The President then was asked whether the procedure agreed upon of attaching the new taxes to the resolution continuing the nuisance taxes, which otherwise expire Saturday, did not mean that the Government was going to lose $1,500,000 a day for every day of delay after Saturday.

He relied that this was not necessarily the case. Searching for an alternative, someone asked if there would be another separate continuing resolution to make the nuisance taxes go on. That was a possibility, Mr. Roosevelt said. Again he emphasized the Saturday dead line for his new tax program as being what he characterized as a story made out of whole cloth.

HADN'T READ RATES

Asked to define again the purpose of his new taxes, he replied that they were for both revenue and a better social order. Asked whether he had made the tax-rate recommendations which were given out by the Senate Finance Committee last night, the President said he had made recommendations simply of principle and policy. He said he was leaving the schedule to Congress. As to the published rates, he asserted he had not even read them.

Mr. President, this matter is of some interest, it seems to me, and is of some concern to the Senate. We are accustomed here, when a Senator rises on the floor and states to his colleagues that the President desires a certain thing, to take it as a hundred percent correct, and I have never known a United States Senator to make a false statement with respect to what the President wanted. I stand here now to defend the Senator from Mississippi in his statement on the floor of the Senate that the President wanted this new tax program tacked on to the joint resolution extending the nuisance taxes.

No one here doubts that for a moment. No one doubts anything the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] or the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] says upon this floor. What irritates me is that the President of the United States, because of the loyalty of these two great men, should make them take the blame instead of taking it himself, when he finds that what he proposes is not meeting with the popular appeal which he thought it would receive. That is what I think is important to the country and that is what I think is important to the Senate.

No one in the Senate doubts where the insincerity lies, and if the country has been deceived, no one doubts who it was who deceived the country.

It is impossible to fool the newspapermen. They are doing one job now as well as they ever did it in their lives, that is to point properly to the President of the United States in his proper sphere, and to criticize him where criticism is due. It is a healthy thing for the country when the newspapers get themselves into that particular frame of mind.

The newspapers have shown clearly and distinctly what was intended. It was asked, "Do you mean the President of the United States said what was not true?" Bear this in mind and see how clever his language was. He said, "By Saturday night." He emphasized the fact that there was no agreement that the tax program should be passed by Saturday night. Of course, there could be no agreement there or at any other place on the part of the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Arkansas, or the President himself that the program should be put through by Saturday night, because there was upon the floor of the Senate on both sides a determination that no such thing as that should be passed by Saturday night.

The President undertakes to escape this criticism, and undertakes to show that he did not know anything about it, or did not propose it at all, by suggesting that there was no agreement that it should be passed by Saturday night. Of course, the Senator from Arkansas did not say it should be passed by Saturday night, nor did the Senator from Mississippi say it should be passed by Saturday night, but undoubtedly there was agreement that it should be attached to the joint resolution providing for the extension of the nuisance taxes and that it should be passed this week if it were possible to pass it this week.

In order to show the continued interest in this matter, I call attention to an article by John O'Donnell and Doris Fleeson appearing in the Daily News of today. I read:

Headmaster Roosevelt reached for his ruler this morning and gave the gentlemen of the press a smart rap across the knuckles. In tones which indicated the "old Dutch was up", F. D. R. insisted their stories that he wished Congress to rush through his taxation program in 5 days were made out of so much whole cloth.

The reporters gathered about his desk promptly rapped back. Hadn't they been told just that by Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee PAT HARRISON on the White House steps a few seconds after the Mississippian had left Roosevelt's study? They certainly had been so told, they barked.

Cracked back Roosevelt that never had there been a suggestion nor the vaguest intimation from any White House source that the President desired to see his inheritance, income, and corporation tax program spurred through Congress in any 5-day period or any other fixed period, nor had he ever urged that the measure be made a part of the extension of the $1,500,000 a day nuisance-tax legislation which will expire on Monday, end of the fiscal year, unless renewed.

SO PAT HARRISON IS CAPITOL'S CARNERA

Back came the White House correspondents once more and put wheelhorse PAT HARRISON strictly on the spot. He had given the information. And the retort from F. D. R. in that sharp and brittle exchange of questions (there was none of that much publicized press conference banter and wisecracking in this morning's White House meeting) left the absent PAT HARRISON still on the spot—except that the spot was bigger and hotter.

Within a few seconds a report on the press conference had reached Capitol Hill. Leader Senator JOE ROBINSON and his pal PAT HARRISON, both present at the now famous conference, paced the corridors in a daze, beating a retreat when they saw a reporter approaching. Through the press galleries spread the day's Washington wisecrack:

"PAT HARRISON is the Capitol's Carnera—except that Primo knows who hit him. Pat hasn't come to yet."

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is no one in this Chamber who is more popular on both sides of it than is the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi. Not even in those days when he had nothing to do but to criticize President-elect Hoover, and President Hoover when he became President, long before he took upon himself the great responsibility he has assumed as Chairman of the Committee on Finance, notwithstanding all the sharp thrusts he made at those of us on this side, and particularly at the distinguished former Senator from Indiana, Mr. Watson, who was trying to follow the then President, and who proclaimed that the President shifted his position so often that it was difficult for him to follow. With all the Senator from Mississippi said, not once, not at any time did anybody hold anything against him; not once, not at any time did anyone lose his high regard for the Senator and his great love for him.

Today our pity goes out to him; we are sorry for him; and my only effort is to put the blame where it belongs, and to compliment the great Senator from Mississippi in standing up boldly and taking it on the chin in order that he may relieve the great President whom he loves of an embarrassing position. There are not many here who would do it, and I think it is to the great credit of the Senator from Mississippi that he is willing to do it.

I do not know of anyone who is stronger than is the Senator from Mississippi. I do not know of anyone who can take these raps and take them as patiently and with as sweet a smile as can the Senator from Mississippi. But, as I have said, our hearts go out to him, and I should like to do something to make him a little easier, and to make him unafraid to approach the reporters, because he has not any idea now whether he is going to be called upon to put the tax bill across next week or not. He does not know at all whether or not the President will withdraw it. He has not any more idea than I have, he has not any more idea than the President has, and the Lord knows that the President does not know what he is going to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I make these observations in all earnestness, and I make them with the hope that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi may be able to have an easier week-end—unless he happens to be invited to the White House in the meantime. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I appreciate the warm compliments the Senator from Delaware in his closing remarks bestowed upon me. I am glad the Senator loves me as much as he says he does, and I am glad he thinks that I can take it on the chin.

Mr. President, this is a very simple matter. I cannot understand how Senators could become so confused, as has the Senator from Delaware, about this matter. I cannot understand how any newspaper correspondent could become confused as to what has happened, and certainly the country will not be misled as to what has happened.

The Senator in opening his remarks in criticism of the President—and, of course, that was the object of his philippic—said that in sending his message of the 19th of June the President was merely making a political gesture intended for the country, and that it was merely to combat another program embodying the "share-the-wealth" idea.

Of course, a Senator—and I am sure that there are none here except my friend from Delaware who would have that kind of an idea—who just proceeds on the assumption that the President of the United States in sending his message on June 19 to Congress was making a political gesture and that his action was not sincere, naturally would reach the conclusions which the Senator from Delaware has reached. But I am sure no other Senator entertains such an idea.

Mr. President, is there anything in the record of the President of the United States upon which to base such an assumption? Has he made political gestures since he first became President of the United States? Was it a political gesture when he suggested taking care of the unemployed of the country and when he requested the authority to enable him to try to give jobs to the great army of the unemployed? That was no mere gesture. The proposal was suggested to the Congress in sincerity, and the President fought for it courageously, even against men of his own political faith, as well as against the Senator from Delaware, and some few who believed as the Senator from Delaware believed.

Was it a political gesture when the President of the United States suggested legislation to control under regulation the stock exchanges and the issuance of securities? Senators will recall—I remember well—how the pages of the newspapers were filled with articles against it and what powerful opposition he had to encounter. Some who then had the same idea as had the Senator from Delaware said that the President was not in earnest, that it was merely a political gesture, that nothing would come of the legislation. But did the President stop? Did he hesitate? Did he halt? No; he drove right on through. Finally the legislation was enacted, and now the same gentlemen who criticized him and found fault with him praise the legislation and say that it has brought forth good fruit.

Did the President merely make a political gesture when he asked for the enactment of the social-security bill which has just been passed by the Congress? No Member on the Finance Committee, of which no one wields a more potent influence than does the Senator from Delaware, fought that legislation quite so hard as he, and none was so persistent in his efforts in opposition to that legislation. In the committee he made a motion to strike out certain features of the bill, including that to give assistance to the States with reference to old-age pensions. He made a motion to strike out the unemployment-insurance feature. He made a motion to strike out the provision for building up the fund for Government assistance to the old.

So when the message on social security came from the President of the United States I presume the Senator from Delaware and those who believe as he does—and there are but few of them—thought it was a mere political gesture; that the President was not in earnest; that he was not sincere about it; that he was merely making an appeal to the old people, to the great laboring class, to the forward-looking masses of the country who desire progressive legislation. But the President did not stop. He just drove right on, and the Congress passed the legislation, and now it is well on its way to final enactment.

I shall not impose upon the patience of the Senate and take its time to recite in detail the record of legislation suggested by the President of the United States, which has been passed by Congress and which would be termed by the Senator from Delaware as merely political gestures. I say to him that he cannot now point to a single suggestion in a single message sent by the President of the United States to the Congress that was a mere political gesture, because no man has been more sincere, no man has had stronger convictions, no man has had a more definite program, which he was willing to carry through in spite of the opposition of those who did not believe in it and who did not believe in his policies, than the present President of the United States.

If the Senator from Delaware now believes, as he expressed himself a few moments ago when the message of the President came to the Congress, suggesting the legislation to which he has referred, was a mere political gesture, I do not believe that there is a single Senator on the other side of the aisle composed of Republicans who believes as he believes, because there is nothing upon which they can base such a belief.

When the President sent that message here he believed in it. He had a conviction about it. It is not the first time that he has given expression to such a thought.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and others perhaps know that back in the President's mind there has been that thought for some time, not necessarily of sending a message here, but he believed in the expressions contained in the message which he sent to the Congress. So I believe, and I am sure my colleagues here and on the Republican side, with the sole exception of the Senator from Delaware, believe that the President was sincere when he sent his message to Congress on June 19. That message of the President was not a political gesture.

Let us now get down to some of these things about which the Senator has caused laughter with reference to me, and the small and insignificant part which I have played, because of the position which I occupy in this body as Chairman of the Finance Committee. The President made no false statement to any newspaper correspondents in his conference yesterday. There was nothing said there, unless someone may wish to apply a technical construction, that was not true.

Now, let us see about that. The newspapers have said much about it, and a certain impression has been created about it. The President of the United States, so far as I know—and I have been in the various conferences which have been held with reference to this matter—wanted this legislation passed at this session of Congress.

In the first conference I held with the President, together with Chairman DOUGHTON, to which allusion has been made, I did not request the President, when the news first came to me that a message was coming here, not to send the message down that day. I expressed to the President the hope that the message, if he was going to send it, not be sent until we had finished the consideration of the social-security bill, which was to come up for final vote that afternoon, and I expressed the hope that it not be sent until the joint resolution extending the so-called "nuisance" taxes was passed by the Senate of the United States. Why did I do that? Because I knew the ingenious, the adroit, the smart, the able, the crafty Senator from Delaware and others whom he might get to play ball with him would use that message as arguments in opposition to the passage of the social-security bill; that he would cry out, "you are levying a tax here which in the course of a few years will be increased upon the corporations so much", and that that might complicate and delay enactment of the social-security legislation.

Then I realized that the joint resolution passed by the House, and which had been reported out by the Finance Committee, must pass the Senate by Saturday night or the Government would lose some $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 revenue a day. I did not want the situation complicated. I wanted to see the question considered upon its own merits and accordingly I gave out the statement to the press to which the Senator has alluded.

I concede to no Senator a greater desire to have the Congress act in legislative matters in an orderly way. I have stood here, as I stood as a Member of the House, for revenue legislation being initiated in the House of Representatives. I wanted this matter to be taken up first in the House. I do not now deny the statement I made to the press when I said I hoped that would be done.

Then came the other meeting to which the Senator from Delaware has alluded and out of which he gets such great delight. It was a splendid conference. It lasted a long time. Every angle of the situation from a legislative standpoint was discussed. While I would not for anything state what the President may say in a conference of which I am a member unless I should be permitted to do so, I can say with reference to that conference that I expressed the thought and the hope that the legislation might originate in the House and be passed by the House and then come to the Senate for our consideration.

I am not going beyond the bounds of propriety when I say that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] took the same position. The President was not opposed to that plan. The President wanted action at this session of Congress. Unlike the Senator from Delaware, who thinks the President's message a political gesture, the President was driving through as he has driven through before when he suggested things for the Congress to do. He is a man of action and he wanted action.

We in that conference knew that standing outside, or sitting or lounging or there in some other way, were the keen-eyed, quick-brained boys of the press. They knew the conference was lasting 2 or more hours and so something had to be said. What the distinguished Senator from Arkansas said to them was absolutely what happened in that conference—that there would be legislation and that, if possible, the proposals would be in the form of amendments to the joint resolution, which would expire at midnight Saturday night.

The Senator from Delaware finds fault and says that the President was all wrong in making the statement that no one had ever heard of this matter being passed by Saturday night; that nothing had gone from the White House to the effect that the legislation must be passed by Saturday night. As one who sat in the conferences I state that I never heard it intimated from the White House, by anybody in the White House, or anybody connected with the White House, that this legislation had to be enacted by Saturday night. If the Senator from Delaware can get any pleasure out of the situation, and if the press of the country or anybody else can explain how the impression got out, I shall be glad to assume responsibility for it.

I did state to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] that I would not bring up the joint resolution because of developments at the White House the night before and that the Finance Committee would meet that afternoon to begin consideration of the three proposals contained in the President's message. The Senator from Oregon asked me why so much haste and if I thought it was possible to do all this by Saturday night. I have the RECORD before me. I did not state that it could be done by Saturday night, because I have had too much experience in the Senate ever to state definitely what can be done by a certain time. I stated to the Senator from Oregon and I stated to others and I stated to the press and to members of my committee that so far as it was within my power I would try to hasten the legislation through the Senate.

When the authority was delegated to me to try to put the amendments on the joint resolution, in due and proper haste I undertook to do it. I do not believe even the Senator from Delaware or any other member of the Finance Committee will charge me with slowness or dereliction of duty as Chairman of the Finance Committee. When I am charged by this body with the consideration of a matter, I try to expedite it so I can bring our conclusions to the Senate; and upon the floor of the Senate I always try to expedite matters. I followed that course with reference to this matter, so the Senate might have it as soon as the Finance Committee had concluded its consideration of the matter. I was in dead earnest in stating my hope that the legislation might be enacted by Saturday night. I doubted its being done, however. I did not believe I could do it, but I was certainly going to try to hold the Senate here, if a majority of the Senators were with me, and endeavor to put steam behind the Senate and get action upon the legislation by that time.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wonder if the Senator, before he sits down, will explain why he abandoned his plan to amend the joint resolution rather than otherwise?

Mr. HARRISON. I was just coming to that. I was anxious to dispose of the other part of the Senator's allusions first. The reason was—and all those in the conference realize it and it is no secret—because the leadership of the House, as represented in that conference by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. BYRNS, and by the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. DOUGHTON, could not give any assurance that the House would take up the matter for consideration at this session of Congress so that it might be brought before that body for consideration. That was the only reason. If assurance could have been given that night by these leaders that they could take it up over there immediately or as soon as possible, and give it consideration and start it on the way, it would have made me feel very happy. It would have delighted others as well, because I then would have been clothed with authority to come here and get the joint resolution out of the way instead of having a lot of amendments which might be offered, and with the assurance that some action was going to be taken by the Congress during this session.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator know what changed the minds of Messrs. DOUGHTON and BYRNS?

Mr. HARRISON. I know something about that.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish the Senator would tell us about that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Speaker of the House had not consulted those who work with him in the leadership over there, and Chairman DOUGHTON had not consulted the membership of his committee; so they were unwilling to give that assurance, because of those circumstances. So it was that we had to put the matter somewhere. There was a revenue bill before the Senate. Apparently, the only way there was any assurance of having the matter considered by this session of Congress was in the form of amendments to the joint resolution, and so we proceeded in that way.

I realized that we would have to go into the subject carefully. I am not one who is inclined to take precipitate action upon any question. I know that when it comes to the Federal Government putting on inheritance taxes, there are many intricate questions which must be considered. We must consider the question of the length of time in which the taxes may be paid, and many other phases of the subject. So we were going to grant some hearings; but first we were going to listen to the experts, because I know, as other Members know, where the requests first come from whenever public hearings are announced. It was suggested in the Finance Committee, when we were considering this matter, that the requests of two particular individuals to be heard would certainly be made. Their requests were made first, and the very next morning those gentlemen were there, because they are there every time we have a tax matter before the committee; and they have not very often thrown much light on the particular subject involved.

Answering the Senator from Delaware as to why the change of mind was effected, I do not know, except that the next morning, when the Finance Committee met to hear the experts and obtain their estimates, and they had not finished their work, and the committee adjourned, I immediately got in touch with the leader of the House. I traveled back and forth as the "Capitol Carnera", as the Senator from Delaware has termed me, though I do not much like that compliment. At any rate, back and forth I went. I spent hours over at the other end of the Capitol in conference with Speaker BYRNS, with Chairman DOUGHTON, and with the whole Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee. I told them the whole situation. I expressed to them the hope, in order to give us time in which to consider this matter, so that we might not act with seemingly undue haste, that they would pass a joint resolution extending the nuisance taxes for 60 days, and we could then pass that measure and leave before the Senate the joint resolution which they had previously passed, extending the taxes for 2 years. In the meanwhile we could take up the new tax program and write it into law. I asked them if they could give us assurance that they would take up the recommendations of the President. Every member of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, as well as the Speaker of the House, said, "We assure you and you can assure the President, and you can assure everyone else, that we shall take it up just as speedily as possible, even to the extent of sidetracking the so-called "Guffey coal bill", if necessary, in order to put impetus behind the matter, and consider the President's message, and bring out a bill upon the floor of the House, and let the House consider it."

When I received that assurance, I came back and told the Senate about it, and then we passed the joint resolution extending the so-called "nuisance" taxes.

That is the history of the whole matter. I desire to say to the Senator from Delaware and others, since the Committee on Finance had reported out the joint resolution with but one amendment, that if I had wanted to take unfair advantage—and I do not know that it really would have been unfair advantage—I could have called up that joint resolution for consideration and offered the amendments embodying the new tax program in my individual capacity as a Senator. I have never, however, as Chairman of the Finance Committee, made any move respecting taxes without first having called my colleagues together and taken into consideration their views. That is why I called them together. That is why we met that very day. I desired to have my committee behind our action. I desired to get their reaction to this situation and their cooperation.

Throughout this matter, Mr. President, I have tried to expedite legislation. I am delighted that the matter has passed off as it has, because now the House and the Senate will have time for ample and full consideraion of the whole program. We have passed the joint resolution dealing with the so-called "nuisance" taxes. Whatever wrongdoing has been committed, whatever erroneous impressions may have gone to the country, do not blame the President of the United States. I will take the responsibility upon my back and I will bear it, because all I have done and all he has done and all that has been done by those who sat in conference at the White House has been in accordance with what we thought was our duty as public servants of the country. Let us close this chapter, and let us not talk about the matter any more.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]—which is the best so-called "explanation" which does not explain that I have ever heard the Senator make—I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, following his speech, the leading editorial from the Evening Star of today, entitled "Up and Down the Hill", and another editorial appearing on the same page entitled "Back to Earth."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorials referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star of Thursday, June 27, 1935]

UP AND DOWN THE HILL

The King of France and his 20,000 men who marched up the hill and then marched down again had nothing on the administration in the way of quick reversal of strategy. On Monday night at a conference between the President and Democratic Senate leaders the plan was adopted to attach the proposed new high levies on inheritances and incomes to the "nuisance" tax extension resolution, which, to be effective, must be passed before July 1. Plans were made to that effect. The general reaction throughout the country to this maneuver was decidedly unfavorable. At a White House press conference yesterday the program to push the new tax legislation through before July 1 was repudiated. Meanwhile, the Senate rushed through the nuisance-tax extension measure within 15 minutes, with an amendment reducing the new term of taxation from 2 years to 1, and sent it back to the House, where it had originated. Thus was the "rider" plan dropped.

Just what happened to cause this abrupt change of purpose is somewhat of a mystery. There is evidence that the first proposal was to utilize the nuisance-tax extension to serve as a carrier for the "share-the-wealth" schedule of higher taxation on large incomes and inheritances. There is evidence also that the purpose was to secure immediate action, if possible, by this use of a measure which had to be enacted before July 1. And there is evidence that the senatorial group that called at the White House on Monday night had a perfect understanding to that effect. And, finally, there is evidence of a reversal of plan, leaving the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate in the uncomfortable position of having to abandon the 5-day drive for enactment of the new taxes before July 1, which he had undertaken as a result of the Monday night conference.

Just what caused this change of pace must be left chiefly to the imagination, with some collateral circumstances as an aid to understanding. The suggestion is made that the public reaction to the drastic tax plan was too unfavorable to be ignored. It is also hinted that there was a doubt as to the constitutional propriety of in effect "originating" a specific revenue-raising measure in the Senate. The possibility of another adverse Supreme Court decision may have been considered. It is true that clause 1 of section 7 of the Constitution, which provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives", also provides that "the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills." But would this veritably tax-raising proposal have been sufficiently germane to a mere extension bill? Would it not be far enough within the twilight zone of dubiety to give the Supreme Court ground for rejection?

The King of France who reversed his march was probably wise. The present reversal of strategy assuredly is.

BACK TO EARTH

It is possible that Senator PAT HARRISON and some of his administration colleagues in the House and Senate are wondering today whether there was ever any special message on taxes from the White House; whether there was ever a hurried conference of leaders at the White House last Monday evening, or whether these and the other frantic comings and goings of the past week were merely disturbing dreams.

At any rate, there seems to have been a general awakening, an end to the temporary confusion of effort and ideas, a return to the orderly processes traditionally associated with the serious business of raising revenue through imposition of new and heavy tax burdens.

It is well that it is so and it is more important that this is now the case than it is to conjecture on the reasons for the spectacle of haphazardness to which the country has been treated in the past few days.

The business of framing new revenue laws is back where it belongs—in the Ways and Means Committee of the House. While it still seems to be the case that the new tax program is desired for the present session, there has been an end to the unseemly and unreasonable haste which, in the beginning, threatened to mark consideration of these new taxes.

And now, as the House Ways and Means Committee gets down to brass tacks, there may be logical explanation of the full intent of the new revenue measures. Are they planned at this time to produce a part of the sorely needed funds to begin paying for vast recovery expenditures? Are they introducing a new program of taxation designed eventually to bring about some balance in the Nation's budgeting? Will they be accompanied by a lessening of expenditures? Or are they, as widely interpreted, intended as an answer to the "share-the-wealth" shouters and the "soak-the-rich" advocates?

In the process of hearings on the proposed tax measures some answers to such questions may be developed. At the same time there is to be opportunity for studying, not only rates but effects of proposed new levies. And if Congress chooses to stay here all this summer in working out a new program of taxation, the time thus occupied will not be too much.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. 5809) to amend an act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia."

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the vote on the passage of House bill 5809, relating to alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, be reconsidered, together with the vote ordering the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill; and after this action I shall ask that the bill be taken up, and I will then move the adoption of an amendment and then the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the motion to reconsider? The Chair hears none; and the bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the bill? I do not understand the purpose and nature of the Senator's request.

Mr. KING. I am very happy to explain. The bill as it came from the House inadvertently contained the word "code" instead of the word "each", and was thus made rather unintelligible. The Senate unfortunately failed to discover the error and passed the bill as it came from the House. After it was passed I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which it had been passed, and also moved that the House be requested to return the bill, which has been done.

Now I move, as an amendment, that the word "code", on line 1, page 2, of the bill, be stricken out and that the word "each" be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12 B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AUTHORIZATION TO SIGN BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS DURING RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess or adjournment of the Senate following today's proceedings the Vice President be authorized to sign bills and resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that takes care of the remaining days of this week?

Mr. ROBINSON. It does.

ALASKAN COLONIZATION BY F. E. R. A.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I understand that the legislative program for the day is out of the way; and now that senatorial amenities are concluded, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has done his good deed for the day, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has demonstrated that it is not quite so good a deed, I am going to presume to talk to the Senate for a little while about a matter which has been under discussion here on one or two occasions during the past few days, having to do with the recent colonization experiment in Alaska.

I have a very great admiration for the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who spoke to us about the effort on the part of the Federal Relief Administration to transplant families to Alaska. For a great many months it was my pleasure and privilege to serve with the able and distinguished Senator from Michigan on the committee investigating the munitions industry, and I have learned to have for him and to cherish a very high regard, a regard which impels me to listen with care and with respectful attention to any of his suggestions. So when a few days ago he spoke on the Alaska venture, I gave to his statements the attention which I thought they deserved.

The State of Washington has a great stake in Alaska, because on Puget Sound in the State of Washington are four or five of the very large and very fine harbors to be found on the Pacific coast, at Seattle, Tacoma, Everett, Dillingham, and Olympia, and through these ocean gateways there pours each year a vast tonnage of food, clothing, lumber, and mechanical equipment bound for the Territory of Alaska. So, my State, having this great interest in the Territory of Alaska and its future, I approach the discussion of this subject with more than ordinary interest.

In 1867 our Government, through the genius of William H. Seward, Secretary of State, purchased this great territory, which is about twice the size of Texas. At the present time, because of a dearth of mining activities, there are in Alaska about 30,000 Caucasians and about 30,000 Indians; so that this great territory has a total population of approximately 60,000 people. There is not much in the way of farming activity in Alaska, and, therefore, the population have to be fed largely with food shipped through the ocean gateways on the Pacific coast, to which I have referred.

When the proposal was first made to take several hundred people from some of the devastated and stricken areas of our country—areas not only devastated financially but devastated physically—and to transport them to one of the naturally rich valleys in Alaska, there was some question about the wisdom and the propriety of so doing.

First, to the average man, and probably the average Member of the Senate, Alaska is a land of ice and snow; but no greater misconception than that could exist in the mind of any Member of this body or of anyone in the United States. The portion of Alaska where these settlers, 897 of them, have gone, the Matanuska Valley, is in about the same latitude as is Christiania, Norway, on the Scandinavian Peninsula, a great body of land in Europe which supports a population of millions.

Southeastern Alaska, or that portion of Alaska known as the "Panhandle", is in about the same latitude as Scotland. Therefore when anyone is tempted, through ignorance of climatic conditions there, to look upon Alaska as a bleak and forbidding place, it were well for him to bear in mind that all the expressions that may be directed at Alaska along that line may be laid at the door of Scotland or at the door of the Scandinavian Peninsula in Europe, which for centuries has supported a vast population.

When it was suggested, as I have indicated, that these people should be taken there, it was thought that a number of things would be accomplished, among them a demonstration through a group of sturdy Americans the feasibility of farming in Alaska.

A governmental experiment station has been successfully conducted in the Matanuska Valley for a great many years, under the aegis of one of our departments, an activity which has demonstrated that the Matanuska Valley is rich and fertile and capable of producing food. That is demonstrated by pictures which I have on my desk, which are part of the exhibit sent in by Mr. Hopkins in answer to Senate Resolution 158, under which he made his report.

As I have said, this valley is rich and fertile. It can produce crops in abundance. It was not thought then, and certainly is not thought now, that this venture would be another great palladium floating down from heaven on the celestial wings of the genius of Harry Hopkins or any other man. It was simply an effort to help people who were unable to help themselves.

These people came from areas in Michigan, in Wisconsin, and in Minnesota. They came from areas which climatically have some relationship to the area to which they went. They were from areas which had been literally struck down by the hand of misfortune. They were on the dole, on relief, as millions of people in this country have been on relief. The Government stepped into the picture and presumed to take out of the millions of unemployed in this country a small group of people. I desire to have Senators who are concerned about this infinitesimally small group keep in mind the great, somber, sad, and tragic army of millions of people in this country who today, as I stand here, do not know the meaning of economic security. It is this great army which Members of the Senate must think about, and not this little fleck of humanity up there in Alaska.

We took those people to Alaska in an effort to give them an opportunity to demonstrate whether or not Alaska will be our last frontier, the last social safety valve of this country. I know the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] well enough to believe that, brilliant and able as he is, he knows full well the direful and deadly significance of the absence of a frontier in America.

There is not a thinker in this country who has presumed to write a book on social and economic conditions in recent years who has not expressed grave concern as to the future of this great Republic, because, forsooth, the frontier had disappeared, and there was no longer any outlet for the pent-up emotions of the people who were under the lash of economic adversity. So here was the opportunity, in a very tiny, infinitesimal way, to demonstrate whether or not America might say to the people under the lash of economic adversity, "Men and women of America, here is one, yet one, avenue of escape. We cannot say, as Horace Greeley did, 'Go west', but at least there is left to you the one hope, if it can be demonstrated to be justified, that you can go to Alaska and there find a haven of refuge."

That is what was done. Not thousands, not hundreds of thousands, not the great tragic army of millions, but a little handful of 897 people, went up there. What were they? Who were they? They were picked by Harry Hopkins from sturdy stock. Out of the 897 only 43, as I remember, are over 40 years of age. In the veins of this group runs and pulsates the hot blood of youth. I have here in this exhibit some pictures, which I wish my friends in the Senate would look at, of these Argonauts who go to what really will be, to them, a land of promise. They are sturdy, clean, fine-looking people—typical Americans, all of them.

I have a very great personal interest in Alaska, because for 4 years my cousin was Governor of that great Territory. I live within a few hours' ride, on fast boats, of Alaska. The people in my section of the country know the meaning of Alaska. They know that it is a land of promise and not a bleak land of ice and snow. In the hundreds of beautiful valleys which dot Alaska is the richest land under the sun. Before I complete my remarks I desire to read a little description of Alaska from some of the material which I have on my desk, because it is very revealing.

Criticism comes trippingly to our lips at times, and I can forgive a man for being critical; but when he is critical I desire him to be critical in the light of all the facts. Let us examine this experiment and see what has happened. The plans for this colonization were suggested only a short time ago, back about March 1 of this year. Measured in time, that is but yesterday.

On March 13 the representatives of the social-service departments and the rural rehabilitation corporations of three States—Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan—came to Washington for a conference. That was about 4 months ago. Let us appraise this venture and see if, with all human weaknesses, men can possibly avoid errors and mistakes of judgment. When I think of these people going to Alaska, riding on the last word in steamship transportation, carried to the very end of their journey on a railroad train, I cannot bring myself to believe that there is any supreme tragedy in this venture.

Mr. President, my grandmother, when she was a young woman, was getting ready to go to the Oregon Territory by ox team. Those pioneers did not ride out to the great golden West in steam trains. They did not go to their destination on twin-screw steamships. That is no challenge to the modern Argonaut who seeks a new home in the far North, or the far West, or the far-flung outposts of our American civilization; but it does suggest that somehow a little of the iron has gone out of our blood when, because somebody does not like somebody else, he says the whole thing is wrong.

How different are the conditions of these Alaskan colonists from those which confronted the iron-blooded pioneers who went west and fought Indians, grubbed out stumps, did not know what it was to have an automobile or a decent stove, or anything else. I have here some pictures showing the last word in tractors, in automobiles, in trucks, going out to the Matanuska colony. Food can be taken in there in abundance, by the tons—hundreds of tons, if need be—by modern transportation methods. Yet, because there have been some errors made, and probably there has been lack of judgment, there comes a criticism which, in my judgment, Mr. President, is not serious enough to challenge us in the Senate at this time.

If a man were being burned alive at the stake, he would not stop to brush off mosquitoes which were biting him. At this very moment, when 11,000,000 homes in this country are catalogued by the P. W. A. as slum dwellings, it ill becomes us to tear our nether garments over what is happening in Alaska, where beautiful log homes of a kind which upstanding Americans in this country cannot have are being provided for the colonists.

Let me read an editorial from the Scripps chain of newspapers, out in the West:

> America's boast of its high standard of living is dealt a terrific blow in the P. W. A. report that lists 11,000,000 of the Nation's homes as definitely in the slum class.

Slums! I would rather be independent and go out West, where I went as a little boy, than live my life in an eastern slum. I have traversed the streets of Philadelphia and New York and other big eastern cities, and there I have seen life in the raw, and I wondered how in God's name people could live and have their being in that sort of an environment and bring up little kiddies. Yet these people who go out into the great open spaces of Alaska can at least be men. There game is plentiful, and there they can have all the thrill and all the excitement that Daniel Boone and his pioneers had as they traversed the great Cumberland Trace into Kentucky, and they can have all the thrill that went with pioneering, of which men whose hair is silvered with gray in this body probably know, either from their own experience in the West or from what their parents told them. These new pioneers can have all that without any of the dangers which went with life in the West, dangers from the Indians and incident to the long separation from centers of civilization and population. These people in Alaska are at the end of a standard-gage, modern railroad and the end of a modern steamship line. When we contrast what they have and can have with what is in the hell holes in the great cities, where people live like rabbits in warrens, where little children are surrounded by an environment that inbreeds crime, I wish to say that the time is at hand to indulge in a little frank discussion of the question whether anybody has been mistreated.

I have indicated that there is a Government experiment station at Matanuska, and I wish Senators would take the pains to know the possibilities of agriculture in that section.

I am going to take the trouble to read a brief statement about Matanuska Valley from the Alaska Agricultural Experiment Station bulletin which was first issued in 1923. Let us not come to the conclusion that decision about Matanuska Valley was reached yesterday or reached by Harry Hopkins. It was reached by the United States Government 12 years ago. I read:

> Under the modifying influence of the surface features and the warm coastal waters, the region—

That is to say, the Matanuska Valley—

> the region has temperate summers, moderately cold winters, and a moderate rainfall. The climate is lacking in extremes of temperature and the light precipitation that characterizes the great interior valleys of the Yukon and its tributaries. The mountain ranges also protect the region against the fierce blizzards of the Arctic region. Because of the protection afforded this region by the mountains on all sides except for a narrow strip on the southwest occupied by Cook Inlet long journeys may be taken at any time in the Matanuska Valley, a condition that does not prevail on the open continental plains in the United States, much farther south. The region is free from tornados and severe electrical storms. In fact, thunder and lightning occur so rarely as to be almost unknown in the Matanuska Valley.

I am paying particular attention to that, because it is typical of so many spots in Alaska. One of the things I suspect has influenced Senators in the discussion, if they were influenced at all, is the thought that Alaska is merely a cold, forbidding place, whereas as a matter of fact it is not.

I ask, not as a favor to me but simply as elemental justice to themselves, to have Senators take the set of exhibits sent here by Mr. Hopkins and go through them and examine them. I urge upon my colleagues that they examine the exhibits sent here by Mr. Hopkins. I am at the moment looking at page K-5 of the exhibit, which shows a view of the school and gymnasium to be erected under the plans now definitely being executed. I say to my colleagues that this schoolhouse and gymnasium would do justice to any small modern American city. It not only has artistic beauty but the plans indicate that it will be of great practical use.

On page K-6 is indicated a group of buildings known as the "teachers' group", which comprises three buildings which will be devoted to educational activities. Again I say to my colleagues that the small American city of the most modern type would be very happy to possess this kind of educational facilities.

I have before me, too, a picture of the manager's home, the man who is to guide and direct some of the activities of the colony.

On page K-9 is shown a warehouse, cannery, and creamery.

In other words, these settlers are having placed at their disposal all those things which the pioneers of old, as we know them, never dreamed of having. This will in fact be a modern small American city in which the produce of the farmers may be canned, in which the produce of the dairy herds may be preserved and handled and warehoused.

On the other pages of the exhibit are shown illustrations of the type of homes which are to be provided for the settlers.

On page F of this exhibit are shown some pictures of the typical homes left by these pioneers who went to Alaska. I ask my colleagues to examine these pictures. One of them is a picture of a rye and oat crop, in which the land was seeded first to rye and then reseeded to oats, and of all sad pictures anyone ever gazed upon this one probably will indicate to any Senator's sound judgment a condition which is simply terrible.

There is another picture of a typical abandoned town in Michigan. There is shown a Michigan farm, an abandoned farm, and homes abandoned by miners, as well as a picture of a deserted village. These people were taken or rather urged to come away from those particular areas where the degree of financial suffering was most acute and was the worst.

From Alaska and from elsewhere have come some statements. The Senator from Michigan the other day read a statement from someone in Alaska, which went into the RECORD. I am going to call the attention of the Senate to one or two statements which have recently appeared in the press, and one or two telegrams from Alaska.

Here is a statement from the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., bearing date Tuesday, June 25. This article is from the pen of Mrs. Lloyd Bell, one of the colonists. In order to illustrate the nature of this controversy and to indicate that is something of a tempest in a teapot, and certainly not worthy of the 42-centimeter intellect of the Senator from Michigan, whose ability has excited my admiration, I desire to read this article:

ALASKA COLONISTS HELD SATISFIED—WOMAN PIONEER DECLARES REPORTS ON CONDITIONS HAVE BEEN EXAGGERATED

(The following description of life and the situation in the Matanuska colony project in Alaska was written for the Associated Press by Mrs. Lloyd Bell, one of the colonists who formerly lived in Minnesota)

PALMER, ALASKA, June 25.—The weather in the Matanuska Valley is wonderful, with the days quite hot at times but the nights cool. The days are long, with only a few hours of twilight for "darkness" this time of the year.

With plenty of rain, the vegetation grows rapidly and the native blue joint grass is already shoulder high in places. The woods are a mass of flowers, but the mosquitoes are very bad in the timber. They are no menace in the open and we are told with the settlement of the land they will be eliminated.

MOST OF COLONISTS PLEASED

Most of the colonists are well pleased with the country.

Lloyd Bell, of Mora, Minn., says it would take a squad of soldiers to get him out of the valley. Gilford Lemon, of Koochaching County, Minn., says he intends to stay "until hell freezes over." Many other colonists express similar opinions.

The colonists are highly pleased with the agricultural possibilities here but are disappointed with the progress being made under corporation control.

Most of the colonists are still in their tents, but they are fixed very comfortable with board floors, doors, and screen windows. A library has been opened in the community hall, with a few books and lots of magazines.

A bus line makes two complete tours of the different camp centers twice daily, and baseball games are played almost every Sunday. The children are having a glorious time, with large playground swings, teeter-totters and games of kitten ball, horseshoes, and marbles. Church and Sunday school are held every Sunday.

CHILDREN'S DISEASES PREVALENT

There is much sickness, but it is mostly measles, mumps, chicken pox and pink eye, and no serious diseases.

Let me digress long enough to say that there were a number of cases of measles, and some other troubles of childhood, among these settlers before they left the States.

To resume the article:

Many should never have come here because of poor health. There are two doctors and one Red Cross nurse with the transient workers, and they are aiding the colonists, too. There are at least five registered nurses among the colonists.

A big complaint is that the doctor has no car of his own, and the colonists are scattered all over the valley.

Provisions are being made for about 15 teachers to come here for approximately 375 to 380 pupils in the fall. The school land is being cleared and more materials are arriving daily.

Several agitators in the colony are keeping things continually boiling. We would like to have them deported. There is cause for complaint here, but report of conditions have been exaggerated.

The construction work is slow, as wrong equipment and materials have been shipped. Mr. Irwin [Don Irwin, project manager] ordered wagons and received school furniture and gasoline tanks.

The colonists want United States control continued, with Mr. Irwin in complete charge. He is well liked by all the colonists.

That is a typical statement from one of the colonists.

Here speaks the mayor of Seward, Alaska, one of the enterprising towns nearby. I happen to be a friend of Mayor Brownell. Bear in mind, this is not a far-flung wilderness. This colony is within 40 miles by railroad, and soon by a good wagon road, of a flourishing Alaskan city, Anchorage, which, like Seward—which is a little farther away—will soon, I believe, be supplied with vegetables, milk, and the like, from this colony.

This is what the mayor of Seward, Mr. Brownell, has to say, and he is close by this colony:

Brownell cannot see anything but success for the Government's colonizing project at Matanuska.

"Matanuska will emerge a prosperous and contented rural community that will be but the start of the rapid growth of Alaska", Brownell said.

"In our own neighborhood of Kenai Peninsula, there are a thousand square miles of the most beautiful farming land that could be desired. It needs only roads to open it to rapid settlement. We plan to open this section next year."

Brownell's optimism radiated in other fields also:

"The new breakwater authorized for Seward will give us a sheltered harbor second to none and will soon bring back the fishing fleet where it belongs. And our aviation field improvements will put it in the front rank.

There, within a comparatively few miles of this colony, is a great aviation field; and Alaska is opening up as is probably no other part of this country. As a matter of fact, as I stand here, Members of the Senate, I am wondering how many poor devils who are literally chained to the dole in this country, and especially the young boys and girls dwelling in some of the slums, who have nothing to turn to, would experience a great and wonderful thrill if they could go to Alaska. Some of them would give their heart's blood to go up there, where there are doctors, nurses, a railroad line, game to be had with a shotgun and rifle, and the opportunity to own a home up in that great country which is coming to the front. It does not behoove us to speak ill of Alaska.

Says the Associated Press of June 25:

Practically all the settlers are content with their lot, Anchorage residents said, adding the chief anxiety was over construction of adequate houses before winter comes.

Of course, they are going to be anxious to have roofs over their heads—the beautiful log houses that are being built there. I ask any Member of the Senate to look at these pictures. A log house in Alaska, properly prepared, can be a virtual little palace for a man who desires a good home up there, warm and snug. For $3,500 the Government is going to furnish these homes, supply furniture, proper equipment for the farm, livestock, 40 acres of good valley land, and give these people 30 years in which to pay for it at the average rate of about $190 a year.

I ask the millions of Americans who have no hope in their hearts today whether they would not like an opportunity to become the owner of a home and be free in the last frontier of America for $190 a year, and that payment not to be made for several years yet. Economic freedom, food, economic security—that is closer to the great heart of the mass of the American people than anything else, because I agree with the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day, when he said that political freedom without economic freedom was "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." We cannot offer any more hellish insult to the average citizen who has the faintest adumbration of intelligence than to suggest to him that political freedom will solve his problems when he knows, and every other man worthy of the toga of American citizenship knows, that political freedom without economic freedom is a noisome thing and a stench. These people have offered to them economic freedom. Read their complaint. We may give it the worst cast we can, and there is not anything in the complaint that is really worthy of the Senate's attention.

In my own home State, right in my own city tonight, troops are patrolling the streets, using gas on men who are involved in a strike. Those men have a great stake—all of them. The business men there say they have a great stake. The workers have a stake. This whole question revolves around the question of economic security; and yet when Harry Hopkins picks out a little handful of people and sends them to Alaska and tries to give them some degree of economic security, because Hopkins makes one little mistake we presume to sit in judgment on him.

Here is a statement from Joseph R. Crimont, S. J., D. D. I think he is the Catholic bishop of Alaska. My friend Delegate DIMOND assures me that he is. This is what he said on the 25th of May. He has been 40 years in Alaska, I am told, and is a good "sourdough" up there. He is ministering to the spiritual needs of Alaskans. There are not many preachers and priests up there, and this man is doing his work in his spiritual field. He says this word of welcome to the Matanuska colonists:

WELCOME

As Alaskans, duly fired with the love of our great northland, we hailed with great applause the news of the colonization plan devised at Washington to promote the healthy growth of our Territory, while lending a helping hand to a number of American citizens the most severely hit by the ruination of agricultural areas in the States.

We watched with keen interest the development of the project until we now rejoice with you over its auspicious accomplishment, and ask God to give it the most complete and abiding success.

We welcome you with a warm heart as our brothers and sisters into our Alaskan family, for we are still imbued with the spirit which animated the pioneers of long ago, when every man or woman was greeted and treated as a true brother or sister because of the need that each felt, in the then vast wilderness, of close, helpful fellowship for the realization of social and economic welfare.

We bid you welcome to the land of promise which a benevolent Government has prepared for you. A land of promise, indeed it is, as you will not be slow to learn and experience. Every natural means you may wish for to achieve your ambition for a happy existence is yours by the good will of Washington. If to that ample measure of material aid you add your quota of loyalty to conscience, and duty to God and to man, success and happiness cannot fail to bless your efforts.

You will love your new country as we do, even its climate and its hardships as they may be.

You will love your toil to bring out the fruits of the soil because of your ambition to do your part in the upbuilding of the future sovereign State of the Union, to which honor and dignity Alaska is aspiring, and for which she only needs population. You are the vanguard of the builders who are to follow you. We salute you with pride.

Your church welcomes you, whatever the name of your religious affiliation. You need her, because you need religion for the fullness of your human life and for constructive influence on the life of the Territory.

If you are a Catholic, you will see your church come into the midst of you, the grand old church that stretches out to you her loving arms, those arms large enough to embrace all the children of men and press them to her maternal heart.

You will feel at home, as you have felt elsewhere, with her liturgical services of holy mass and benediction of the blessed sacrament; at home with her sacraments, her devotions, her doctrinal instructions, the same always and everywhere, to encourage you, guide you, and comfort you, for she is the God-made instrument to provide for every need of your soul and aspiration of your heart as a religious human being.

Welcome, then, not only once or twice but a thousand times!

JOSEPH R. CRIMONT, S. J., D. D.,
Bp. Vic. Ap. of Alaska.

So speaks the old Alaskan "sourdough", who probably went to the Territory as a young priest and became the bishop of Alaska. There speaks a man who knows from experience what Alaska holds out to the boy or the girl who wants to go into that great Territory.

I call attention to a telegram bearing date June 24, sent to Col. Lawrence Westbrook, of Mr. Hopkins' staff. It reads as follows:

Col. LAWRENCE WESTBROOK,
F. E. R. A., Washington, D. C.:

Doctor reports no serious illness in colony or transient camp. Three cases chicken pox, 2 mumps, 9 measles, all colonists' children. Have adequate medical supplies or can get same from Anchorage. Some cases cannot treat locally sent to Anchorage hospital.

Let me digress for a moment to point out that within 40 miles of this frontier outpost is a modern American hospital in a modern city.

Beginning work on creamery, cannery warehouse, and commissary. Well for community center down about 20 feet. Responsibility construction work delegated to Bliss as suggested your wire. Expect 125 men for Bliss on North Star.

Let me say that those are probably the transient workers who are coming up there to expedite this work.

Requested Alaska A. R. R. C. furnish 100 or more skilled men help construction work same basis transients, to be housed separate camp. Troast left valley for Juneau on boat last Saturday.

Mr. President, that is a rather illuminating telegram from a man right on the job.

I am not going to burden the Senate by reading all of the material which I have here. What I have just read is typical of the reactions coming from those in charge up there.

I want to hurry this statement along, as I do not desire to take much more time, but I do wish to comment on one or two things especially. One is the contract. Criticism has been made of the contract, and really I was astonished when my able friend the Senator from Michigan referred to this as a sort of a commune, or communistic venture.

I wish to say, after 25 years of law practice, in which I have drawn hundreds and hundreds of conditional sales contracts involving the transfer of land, that this contract made with the settler in the Matanuska Valley is a very, very generous contract.

Mr. President, I say to my colleagues in the Senate that they can search this country with a fine-tooth comb from one end to the other and cannot find and exhibit to me a contract of a bank or a private seller of land that gets within a million miles of the generous gesture this contract makes to the prospective purchaser of lands in Alaska.

The average land contract is cold and hard, and the man who holds the contract can clamp down on the buyer, and if the buyer objects and insists that there is something in it to protect him, the seller can say, "It is not so nominated in the bond. I want my pound of flesh"; and he can get it in the courts. There are in such contracts clauses which really amount to handcuffs on the wrists of the buyer.

I ask the Members of the Senate to look over this contract. It has been suggested, however, that the contract is bad because, forsooth, it provides that—

> The colonist further agrees that he and the members of his family will abide by all Corporation administrative directions and supervision in connection with control of crop production, processing, marketing, distribution, crop rotation, soil management, sanitation, and other measures for the welfare of the community.

Let me say, first, that with the market conditions of Alaska as they are, there must be some intelligent control of crops and rotation of crops. Suppose every colonist up there grew potatoes; they would destroy themselves economically by that sort of practice. The man who is handling this settlement, and concerning whom there has been no criticism, the man whose judgment as a skilled agriculturist is to guide these people, is there to give them the benefit not only of his own judgment, but the judgment of the agriculturalists of Alaska, as to market conditions. That is necessary if the colonists who are not familiar with market conditions in Alaska are to have the type of help to which they are entitled.

Mr. President, one of my colleagues has very kindly called my attention to the fact that many land contracts under which ownership is vested in individuals right here in the East—by "the East" I mean the Eastern States—are filled with restrictive features of all kinds; and if we are going to lay a challenge against this contract, we might very successfully lay a challenge at the door of many real-estate operations. However, I desire to say that, in my judgment, this contract is very generous. The colonists have 30 years in which to pay for their homes. What have they left? They left a home land so somber that perhaps I could not attempt to describe it here. Back home they were on the dole, perhaps getting $25 a month. What hope was there for those people in Michigan and Wisconsin and Minnesota, where they were facing the dire, stark tragedy which confronted them?

There are people in my State who probably are in the same position. Those who went to Alaska were selected from certain particular sections of three States, because, first, the degree of dependency was very acute in those sections and the welfare workers there could not see any hope of a future for those people; and, second, because they lived in climates which probably fitted them physically, easily and gracefully, to adapt themselves to the climatic conditions of Alaska.

I look at my good friend, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and I feel sorry for him, because the region from which he comes is so cold. I live in the State of Washington, where it does not get so cold. The Senator cannot help it because it gets so cold in his State. He probably was born in Wisconsin, and loves the State; and, if he does, he probably loves good old Wisconsin for the same reason that the good old sourdoughs love Alaska; and they do not like to hear Senators rise and make unkind remarks about Alaska.

Here sits at my elbow my good friend ANTHONY DIMOND, Delegate from Alaska, who was all burned up because of the implication that Alaska was a bad place. If anyone goes out in my country and makes critical remarks about Alaska to the old sourdoughs they do not like it; and, after a fashion, I do not either.

It has been said on the floor, and I think our very able friend the Senator from Michigan suggested, that the colonists in the Matanuska Valley were dissatisfied because things were not going fast enough for them, that houses were not going up with sufficient rapidity; and all the time Harry Hopkins down here is tearing up his nether garments in the endeavor to rush men to Alaska so that the log houses may be constructed. Poor Hopkins, with 5,000 people on his neck all the time! Senators who try to get homes for people in their States should not think he is remiss in his duty because he stops to comb his Hyperion curls every few days. The job of getting help for these people is with him a labor of love. Here is a man lashed from every quarter with demands for assistance, for help, for speed, being criticized here because, forsooth, he does not show greater speed in connection with this project in Alaska when several hundred transient workers have been sent there to help the venture along!

Of course, there are bound to be errors of judgment, and men probably will become a little lazy and not do as much work as they should. Perhaps some of the transient workers do not like the work. The fact remains, however, that our challenge should go only to a man's honesty of purpose, because we are all weak, and we all err.

My friend the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND] has named for me some of the crops which can be grown in the Matanuska Valley in Alaska. He lives near there. Potatoes are grown there very readily, 200 bushels to the acre; oats, 50 to 80 bushels to the acre; wheat, 22 bushels to the acre. Rye is grown very easily and readily there. Barley, hay, and other forage crops are grown there, as well as carrots, artichokes, strawberries, raspberries, and other kinds of berries. It is rather astonishing, is it not, to the Members of the Senate, that strawberries and raspberries are grown in that valley? To hear all the jeremiads and doleful wails here, one would think those things would not grow there. One would never associate strawberries with the Matanuska Valley.

After listening to some of the direful, doleful stories here, I wondered if I should not go out and beat my breast, but I finally concluded that perhaps it was enough to make the decision never to smile again, and let folks know that my cup of misery was full to overflowing.

Dissatisfaction in this colony! I wonder if the people at home in the devastated areas of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan are happy. I wonder if the poor in Wisconsin, in the areas from which the Alaskan colonists came, are any happier than are the poor in my State. I wonder how any man whose kiddies are likely to be hungry can be happy. I marvel at the infinite patience of the poor. I once heard a great philosopher say that the outstanding fact in all history was the infinite patience of the poor. I am glad the poor do not feel as I do, or there would be a housecleaning in this country, which would do some folks good.

Dissatisfaction! Again I ask Members of the Senate whether the poor in their sections of the country are satisfied. At this moment millions in this country are dissatisfied and are trying to find a way out of the rat trap. I stand here in the United States Senate and ask the millions in this country who are on the dole if they are satisfied. I should like to have my friend, the Senator from Michigan, ask the millions of people who are desolated with poverty if they are happy and satisfied. I ask that brilliant man from Michigan, whom I admire greatly—I have learned to admire him much more since he has served on the Munitions Committee, and revealed much strength of purpose and determination in certain directions, which excited my admiration—I ask him if he thinks it is worthy of his genius and his skill and his talents to challenge Harry Hopkins on this little thing, when millions and millions of homes in this country are desolated with poverty. In God's name, let us try to find someway out for all the people, and not pick out one little group!

I yield to no man in my sincere and heart-felt desire to help the small man. If there is any one thing I hope to do while in this body, it is to voice the aspirations and needs of the poor, especially those who cannot be heard; and I will do it if it is the last thing on earth I do, even if I never again see this body. I wish to be sure, however, that whatever energy God has vouchsafed to me shall be devoted, not to helping just one little group of poor, one segment of the great, sad army of the poor, but the whole army of the poor.

I am not going to waste the precious energy which the Almighty has given me, whatever little reservoir of it is left, trying to protect one little, tiny, infinitesimal segment of the people. I want to try to apply remedies, so far as I can do so here, to lift a great army of people out of the slough of despond.

I wonder that anyone should think this colony could come into existence without dissatisfaction; that suddenly, within a few weeks, we could translate a locality where no one lived into a flourishing American community and somebody not be dissatisfied.

Does my good friend the Senator from Michigan or any other Senator think that project, with every technique and every mechanism complete, could be made to spring into existence from the brow of Harry Hopkins as Minerva sprang from the brow of Olympian Jove, full panoplied and ready to do battle? Certainly it is not to be believed that any able Member of the Senate could believe anything like this could be consummated without someone uttering a wail of woe.

It is so easy to criticize—oh, so easy to criticize! My good friend the Senator from Michigan served on the Munitions Committee, and there he saw how easy it was to pin the label of adverse criticism on someone. We had a gentleman by the name of Shearer before the committee. It is a wonder some of those on the other side of the aisle, opponents of what the committee has attempted to do, have not quoted Mr. Shearer in their remarks about my good friend Steve Raushenbush, secretary of the committee.

Mr. Shearer, in referring to some well-known gentlemen in this country, such gentlemen as Newton D. Baker, Dr. Harry A. Garfield, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Henry Taft, George Wickersham, and the like, described them as "knaves or fools." We have seen how the power companies pin the Bolshevik label on men who have the temerity to propose public ownership of a power plant. Now, the Senator from Michigan, my good friend, will have the Bolshevik label pinned upon him because, forsooth, the Munitions Committee hired a man that somebody said knew something about the Socialist movement. We ought to know nothing about anything and then we would be happy. We happened to hire a man who was a university graduate and that, in the opinion of some, cast him into the outer darkness.

Returning to Alaska, the farms up there, including household goods, stock, implements, and so forth, will cost the colonists about $3,500, and this amount will be amortized over 30 years with payments deferred from 3 to 5 years.

I want Senators to look at some of the pictures which I have here. Talk about what is going into this colony. Here is a picture of the last word in big trucks—going where? Going over the Old Cumberland Trail into Kentucky with Daniel Boone? Oh, no. They are riding on well-graded roads—on what? The finest trucks in the country. A steam railroad runs into the place.

Here is another picture showing a vast amount of supplies in San Francisco a few weeks back. Here is a picture of the same material being loaded on a vessel to go up there, hundreds and hundreds of stacks of foodstuffs.

Here is another photograph of mattresses, great stacks of them, going to that colony. Here is a big tractor being loaded on a ship to go to the colony. Here is a picture of a Red Cross nurse, a registered nurse, full panoplied, going to the colony to help. Here is a photograph of several flat cars being loaded with the latest type of tractors going to the colony. These tractors are shown in another picture upon a scow ready to be loaded on a ship going to this settlement.

The suggestion was made the other day that there are about a thousand people up there and that they are sick. I cite that as an example of the atrocious blunders which can be made by critics. Only 897 people went to this colony. The transient workers, who went up there to do the work and then to be taken out, would probably bring the total number to 2,000, but the transient workers are going to be taken out as soon as the buildings are completed. The transient workers were selected because of their ability to construct the type of buildings which are to be erected there. They were taken from the relief rolls for that purpose.

The 201 families who are the colonists were drawn from the relief rolls in the States. These families were definitely stranded where they were and were totally dependent upon the Government for their living. Can one imagine anything worse than that? Can Senators imagine anything more degrading than that a man should be dependent upon the Government for the food that goes into his stomach, and has to accept it, nolens volens, whether he wants to or not, as he cannot eat unless the Government gives it to him?

That is the type of people who have been taken to this colony—splendid people who have suffered the misfortune of tripping on life's pathway through no fault of their own. There was no hope of their employment, and they might easily have degenerated into hopeless reliance upon the Government for their continual support. I ask Senators if they want to do anything that will stimulate a placid acceptance of a peasantry of that kind in this country? If that is to be the end of agricultural America, we had better start house cleaning right now.

Mr. President, I have taken this much time because I did not want to have spread abroad the wrong idea about what is being done. I did not want anyone to take this tiny group of people and indict Harry Hopkins for doing that which, in his judgment, is sound, and which I believe to be sound. I am glad Harry Hopkins sent these people to Alaska.

In the matter of subsistence, such diverse commodities as milk, flour, cereals, potatoes, tomatoes, leafy green and yellow vegetables, dried fruits and vegetables, dried beans, peas, nuts, butter, sugar, meat, and eggs are available, and the cost of these commodities furnished to the colonists is charged to them with other items of cost. In some cases the costs are probably higher than in the States, but that is due to the fact that traffic conditions there cause higher prices, but the colonists are getting more money for their labor.

The school equipment which will be furnished will be equal to that supplied in the average up-to-date American city.

The last and final consideration: This colony will cost around $1,000,000. I say to my friends in the Senate that if the Government, at an expenditure of around $1,000,000, can bring not only happiness to these people, nearly a thousand of them, but can plant definitely in their hearts hope, and can establish a new type of colonization in Alaska where a great future awaits, it is money well spent.

A million dollars? Money has been poured out like water on many projects that are not worth while. We know of instances where not one million, but millions and millions have been given away to an outfit for hauling a little handful of mail. Let us not stand here in conflict splitting hairs over an adventure of this kind. What is more important is the fact that future relations in the great Pacific are going to center around Alaska. We have voted here to establish airports in Alaska, and it were just as well, although I do not particularly emphasize that aspect. I think my brethren should understand that it was the part of wisdom for this country to make this last great frontier, this last haven of refuge for people who want to know economic freedom for themselves, their sons and daughters. I am glad to see this experiment, because it is a revival of the old days when pioneers rolled across the plains with their rifles on their shoulders; but, thank God, by the gift of modern science these people can have all the thrills of pioneer days and the boys and girls, in this way, can have all the thrills of the pioneer boys and girls.

They can have all those things, and along with them they can have economic security. They can know what that means. I thank God that Harry Hopkins had the foresight and the vision to undertake this project.

Many people said the Louisiana Purchase was stupid; many very able, smart people—smarter than a lot of us in this body—said it was a very asinine, stupid performance for the Thirteen Colonies to cut loose from the mother country, because they would never make a go of it; many people in this world have been so timid that they have finally slipped down over the edge into nameless and forgotten graves.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks the statement of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration dated March 25, 1935, which is one of the first public references to the Matanuska development. Attached to it is Document No. 4906, which has some general information about Alaska. I am presenting these documents because they give a very frank and realistic discussion of Alaska. The statements made are very revealing. No human being could have been misled. Harry Hopkins was very frank in telling the colonists the exact conditions in Alaska, and there is not any room for the statement that any human being could have been misled. I am very anxious that the country should have this information.

I also ask permission to have Administrator Hopkins' answer to Senate Joint Resolution 158 published as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURKE in the chair). Without objection, the documents presented by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TWO HUNDRED RELIEF FAMILIES TO BE REMOVED TO FERTILE ALASKA VALLEY FOR REHABILITATION

FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION, Washington.

Two hundred families, representing approximately 1,000 persons, now on the relief rolls of northern Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin will soon be given the opportunity to rehabilitate themselves as homesteaders in the fertile Matanuska Valley of Alaska, it was announced today by Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator. The Matanuska project is to be developed by the Rural Rehabilitation Division of F. E. R. A., of which Col. Lawrence Westbrook is administrator, in cooperation with the Department of the Interior.

In addition to the settlers, 400 men from transient camps are to be selected to aid in locating the former on the development. The first contingent of transients, able-bodied woodsmen and mechanics from wooded areas of the west coast, will sail from Seattle on April 20. A second contingent will sail on May 1 and the last contingent on May 15. The transients are to be paid the same as C. C. C. workers, but will be given a cash allowance of only $2 a week while they are in Alaska. When returned to Seattle in October they will be given their accumulated earnings which, it is expected, will enable them to make a new start in life.

The 200 families which are to be transplanted have been tentatively selected from those who from experience and habits are best fitted to lead the rigorous life of pioneers in a northern climate. Final selection will be made on April 5, and those selected will be moved in small groups to nearby concentration points, after which they will leave for Seattle, there to take ship for Alaska in two groups, one on May 1 and the other on May 15.

Both the transients and the settlers will live in tent cities during the summer months when log houses are being built and woods cleared. The houses will contain from one to three bedrooms, indoor chemical toilets, and will be supplied with running water. For the present there will be no baths installed, and wood-burning stoves will provide the heating and cooking needs of the household. Kerosene or gasoline lamps will supply light. The settlers will take with them all their household belongings and tractors and other essential farming equipment, together with livestock, will be transported to the site of the rehabilitation project.

The Alaska Rural Rehabilitation Corporation, soon to be chartered, will handle the project. Each settler will be provided a tract of 40 acres of improved land with house fully equipped and necessary farming accessories. The cost will be approximately $3,000 for each farm, and the settler will be given 30 years in which to discharge the debt. It is expected that families will begin repaying their loans in the fifth year. Interest will be charged but not collected during the first 4 years, and it will be prorated with the rest of the debt over the amortization period. It is planned to charge 3-percent interest. The title to all property will be in the Rural Rehabilitation Corporation until the debt is completely discharged.

The site of the settlement is 125 miles north of the port of Seward, on the Alaska Railroad and the main road from Anchorage. The valley contains approximately 128,000 acres, of which 34,040 are public domain. Some 42,760 acres are homesteaded, with occupied land aggregating 23,000 acres. There are 117 families in the valley now. It is estimated that, on a basis of 40-acre tracts, the valley will accommodate 850 additional families. The land is fertile, and although the winters are long and the summers short, it is good dairy country and most of the hardier crops can be grown. The United States Government maintains an agricultural experiment station there, and the settlers will have the assistance of the station experts in the selection of crops.

It is planned to establish a community center at Palmer, a small village in the valley, and to build there a school to accommodate 400 children, a nondenominational church, a creamery and cannery, and such stores as may be needed. Directors of the project will also reside at Palmer in houses to be constructed this summer.

While the temperature in the Matanuska Valley is milder than in some sections of the States, the mercury at times drops as low as 40 below. There is a great variation in the length of the day between winter and summer. Beginning April 15 there are 14 hours of sunshine, and this increases until June 15, when the sun shines for 20 hours and there is no darkness. From this date on the hours of sunshine shorten at the same ratio as they increase in the spring. The region is free from tornadoes and severe electrical storms, but from July until September there is generally a heavy rainfall. One of the pests which the settlers will have to combat is the mosquito, which is present in great numbers throughout the summer. As the woods are cleared, however, it is expected annoyance from this pest will be eliminated.

The first manager of the new settlement will be Don Irwin, who has been loaned by the Alaska Agricultural College to inaugurate the project. The Bureau of Indian Affairs has granted a leave of absence to N. Lester Troast, of Juneau, who will direct construction activities. Both men are now in Washington completing arrangements for the project.

(Added detail may be obtained from Bulletin No. 4906, attached.)

ALASKA

I. GENERAL INFORMATION

A. History and climatic conditions: Alaska, our largest Territory, was purchased from Russia in 1867 at a cost of $7,200,000. Prior to this purchase it had been dominated by the Russian-American Co., which exercised absolute dominion over Alaska for the preceding 67 years.

The coast line is 26,000 miles long. This Territory is one-fifth the size of the United States, or over twice the size of the State of Texas. Contrary to the general opinion, Alaska is not a land of ice and snow. The southern point of the panhandle is only 500 miles north of Seattle. Three-fourths of Alaska is in the North Temperate Zone, only one-fourth being in the Arctic Circle. It is in approximately the same latitude as Norway and Sweden, the panhandle being in the same latitude as Scotland and Denmark. The climate is comparable to that of Scotland, Norway, and Sweden, although somewhat warmer, as it is tempered by the Japanese current. Actually, the climate is milder than that of many sections of the United States, although near the coast the interior valleys are much colder.

B. Industries: Alaska is famous for gold and other minerals, but her most important industry is her fisheries, the principal business being salmon fishing and packing. Other successful enterprises are fur farms, agriculture, livestock raising, lumber, and the raising of reindeer for commercial markets. The annual tourist business is an important item and prior to the present depression was flourishing.

II. AMERICAN OCCUPATION

The early influx into Alaska was caused by the gold rush. While gold was known to exist as early as 1850 the mining of it for many years was considered impractical. The first rush occurred during the late seventies and early eighties when thousands of men from the United States and Canada rushed to Alaska in hopes of sudden and fabulous wealth. There was a second rush in 1897 after the famous Klondike discovery and again an influx for this elusive metal in 1902. Gold mining is still an important industry but the production is largely stabilized.

Building of the railroads was responsible for the importation of additional men. There is a preponderance of men among the white settlers of this Territory, the ratio being approximately 2½ white men to each white woman. Each summer hundreds of laborers are imported for the season for employment in the canneries, mines, and on the highways and railroads.

III. GOVERNMENT

The organic act under which Alaska became a Territory is to Alaska what a State constitution is to a State. It was approved in August 1912 and two amendments have been since added. Alaska is represented in the Congress of the United States by a Delegate who is in the House of Representatives. The Governor of Alaska is chief executive officer of the Territory, and is appointed by the President of the United States by and with the consent of the Senate for a term of 4 years and until his successor is appointed and qualified. District judges are appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, to preside over the district court in each of the four judicial divisions into which Alaska is divided. The local legislature meets every 2 years.

IV. MATANUSKA VALLEY (SITE OF PROPOSED RURAL REHABILITATION SETTLEMENT)

A. Location: The Matanuska Valley is bound on the north by the Talkeetna Mountains, on the east and south by the Chugach Mountains, and on the west by the vast level plain of the Susitna River. It is about 125 miles in a direct line from the southern coast of Alaska.

B. Climate: The winters are long and the summers short. There is a great variation in the length of the day between winter and summer. There are 14 hours of sunshine per day beginning April 15, and they increase in length until, on June 15, there is 20 hours of sunshine and no darkness. Following this, they shorten at the same ratio as they increase. This valley is comparatively mild, being influenced by the relatively warm waters of the Pacific on the south, the Alaska range on the west, the Talkeetna Mountains on the north, and the Chugach Mountains on the east. The moisture-laden winds from the Pacific through the Cook Inlet sweep against the high mountains and this causes a precipitation of rain and snow over the entire region. This region is free from tornadoes and severe electrical storms. The spring and early summer have the lowest average precipitation. July, August, and September have the heaviest rainfall. Notwithstanding droughts of some severity have occurred in this region since farming was begun, the weather is sometimes unfavorable for curing hay because of these conditions, and at such times hay is placed on racks or piled in cocks supported by thin vertical poles through the center to permit drainage and air.

C. Topography and soil: The Matanuska Valley consists mostly of benches and lowlands with occasional irregular ridges. A variety of soil is embraced ranging in composition from fine silt loam through fine sand to peat, and in drainage, from well-drained bench land to water-soaked marsh. To be put in readiness for cultivation much of this land requires only to be cleared of timber, undergrowth, moss, and other covering of vegetation.

Exclusive of muskeg and muck, there are two broad divisions of soil in the Matanuska Valley: (1) The bench-land soils, and (2) the stream-bottom soils.

Chemical analysis shows that all the soils have a good lime content, higher, in fact, than the average soil in the humid portions of the United States.

The plain rises through successively higher benches, steplike, from a few feet above high tide to a maximum elevation averaging probably 1,200 feet above sea level, where it merges with the flanking mountain slopes. The greater part of the bench land is about 25 to 200 feet above sea level.

D. Drainage: Owing to the sandy and gravelly nature of the soils and subsoils, the bottom lands drain quickly. Strips of deep sand and soils are included which are underlain at shallow depths by gravel and have excessive drainage. On these soils crops suffer from lack of moisture in dry seasons.

E. Water: There is an adequate supply of good water obtainable throughout this valley. Water can be secured either from creeks or wells, the depths of the well ranging from 15 to 60 feet.

F. Present population and existing conditions: The Matanuska Valley embraces 128,000 acres or 200 square miles. It is estimated that of this total 76,800 acres are tillable, of which approximately 1,000 acres are now under cultivation; 42,760 acres are homesteaded; the homestead land that is occupied is estimated at 23,000 acres, while 19,760 acres are owned by nonresident landowners who are either in other parts of Alaska or in the United States. The population of the valley comprises 117 families. Thirty-four thousand and forty acres are public domain. It is estimated on the basis of 40-acre tracts that the 850 additional families could be cared for.

G. Transportation: There are 170 miles of graded unsurfaced roads in the valley. A highway is now in the course of construction from Anchorage to the Matanuska Valley, a distance of about 45 miles. The Alaska railroad passes along the western side of the valley. A branch of the Alaska railroad leaves the main line at the town of Matanuska and follows the west bank of the Matanuska River through the undeveloped town of Palmer, extending as far as the Jonesville coal mines. The Matanuska River runs diagonally through the valley from the northeast to southwest. It is estimated that there are only 3,000 acres of cleared land in the valley.

H. Experiment station: There are two agricultural experiment stations now in operation in Alaska under the jurisdiction of the United States Government, one of which is located in the Matanuska Valley. This station owns 290 acres of land, a little less than one-third of which can be considered as suitable for cultivation. Two hundred and fifty acres have been cleared and brought under cultivation. The greater part of the land is made up of rocky ravines with small lakes and a growth of spruce and some birch and cottonwood trees. Many varieties of spring wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, peas, vetch, and roots have been seeded on this farm. Winter rye is the only fall seeded crop that has succeeded at Matanuska. Experiments are being continued for the purpose of disseminating information to the residents of this section of Alaska.

V. THE ALASKA RURAL REHABILITATION CORPORATION

The organization of the Rural Rehabilitation Corporation in the Territory of Alaska is not completed but is in the process of organization at the present time, and will be completed within the very near future.

VI. INFORMATION CONCERNING PROPOSED RESETTLEMENT IN THE MATANUSKA VALLEY

A. Location from which families will be selected: It is believed advisable to begin with approximately 200 families in the Matanuska Valley settlement project, these families to be placed on 40-acre tracts. This first group of families will be selected from Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, as it is felt that residents in these States should readily adjust themselves to the Matanuska Valley as climatic conditions are comparatively similar.

B. Acquisition of land: Of the total 128,000 acres in Matanuska Valley, approximately 42,769 acres are privately owned by residents and nonresidents. It is estimated that 23,000 acres are accupied at the present time by the 117 families. Nineteen thousand seven hundred and sixty acres are owned by the nonresident landowners, who are either in other parts of Alaska or in the United States. Thirty-four thousand and forty acres are public domain. A plan is being worked out at the present time by which the 34,040 acres will be secured from the United States Government and made available to the Rural Rehabilitation Corporation of Alaska for these new settlers. It is believed that options can be secured on the 19,760 acres now owned by nonresident landowners. The options on these lands will be secured by the duly authorized agent of the Alaska Rural Rehabilitation Corporation.

C. Type of settlement: The village of Palmer, at the present consisting of a post office and railroad station, is located in approximately the heart of the proposed resettlement area. It is about three-fourths of a mile from the Matanuska River. In addition to the railroad station of the Alaska Railroad, the highway from Anchorage into the Matanuska Valley goes through the village. It is planned to develop the village of Palmer. The schoolhouse for the 400 children will be built; the community center will be located there, with its workshops, recreational and religious facilities, its creamery, cannery, and warehouse. The homes of the teachers and the project manager will be built at Palmer and it is expected that several stores will be located there. The present residents now living in the vicinity of Palmer and elsewhere in the Matanuska Valley are much interested in this project. It is expected that they will participate in the program, and undoubtedly there will be a merger of the interests of the group now there with the new group coming in, the combination forming one harmonious unit.

D. Costs: The preliminary estimated budget would indicate a per unit cost of approximately $3,000 per family if the clearing is effected through a source other than residents themselves. There are two reasons why additional assistance will have to be given in the development of this project: (1) The cost to settlers, and (2) the shortness of the warm season necessitates rapid building of homes to enable the families to be comfortable through next winter. It is proposed to secure approximately 400 men from the transient camps of the Northwest and transport them to Matanuska Valley for the period from May through October of 1935, or establish a C. C. C. camp, these men to live in a tent city and to receive their complete maintenance and a cash allowance. If transients are used, it is suggested they be granted same cash allowance as is now given to the C. C. C. An allowance not in excess of $2 a week to be given in cash during the time they are working on the project. The remainder to be used as a stake, to readjust themselves in the industrial field upon their return to Seattle. The preliminary estimated cost if 400 transients are used from May through October is $156,300, or approximately $65.11 per man per month. This would include both maintenance and cash allowance.

It is expected that the families will begin repaying their loan at the beginning of the fifth year. Interest will be charged but not collected during these 4 yours, and it will be prorated with the rest of the debt over the amortization period. It is planned to charge 3-percent interest, the loan to be amortized over a period of 30 years. The title to all property will be held by the Corporation until the debt is completely paid off.

E. Families: The 200 families will be transported to this project in May 1935, the plan being that they will leave in two shipments—the first on May 1 and the second shipment on May 15. The families will live in tents while available cleared land is being seeded and additional land is cleared and the homes built.

F. Homes: It is planned to have the houses of log construction comprising a kitchen, living room, and varying from 1 to 3 bedrooms depending upon the size of the family. There will be indoor chemical toilets, but at the present time it is not planned to install bathrooms. All houses will have water piped indoors. Heat will be supplied by wood stoves, and the accepted method of lighting is by gasoline or kerosene lamps. Telephone communication is available from Palmer.

G. Transportation: Additional roads are being built and the automobile is becoming more valuable each year. As described in the early part of the report, railroad facilities are available, contact with the United States is by steamship.

H. Economic security: Food now shipped into this section of Alaska from the United States, which embraces the cities of Seward, Anchorage, and Fairbanks, and other points served by the Alaska Railroad alone total approximately $1,000,000 annually. A large proportion of this potential market can be supplied by farmers in the Matanuska Valley as soon as there is sufficient land cleared and under cultivation to assure a steady supply of quality products. A creamery and cannery are being planned as soon as there is a sufficient quantity of butterfat and vegetables to justify these industries. Controlled cropping and marketing is contemplated to insure a year around supply of products at a fair margin of profit. It is believed possible to develop dairying with its by-products, and to raise potatoes, vegetables, hay, grain, berries, and other produce. Cattle thrive in this valley, which will assure available meat. There will be considerable grazing land available. Vegetables thrive, especially the more hearty crops such as potatoes, cabbage, etc. It should be possible to supplement the income through the raising of hogs, poultry, and fur-bearing animals.

The social, religious, and educational life will center around Palmer. The community center will have space for work shops, religious services, moving pictures, and other recreational features. The church services should be interdenominational in character. Numerous lakes and the river assure additional recreational facilities for fishing, boating, and swimming. Hunting is an extremely popular sport, and moose, mountain sheep, goats, grizzly bear, rabbits, and various other wildlife abound. Geese and ducks provide excellent sport and the best of food.

CONCLUSION

This project has every indication of success, bringing to Alaska additional settlers, who are needed, and to these families an economic and social security. Care must be taken not to paint the picture to the families in colors that are too rosy. They should be informed as accurately as possible of existing conditions. Hardships will have to be faced, especially for the first couple of years, and many adjustments made. They will be separated from their relatives and lifelong friends. Distance and heavy transportation costs will make visits to their former homes prohibitive for some years. These people should be selected because of their pioneer interests.

Homesteading in Alaska could not be considered an outstanding success. Many lone men going to Alaska for the purpose of working in the canneries, on the railroads, and in the gold mines, applied for and proved a homestead. They made no attempt to develop this homestead for the purpose of subsistence, but held it as an investment. The reason for this is psychological rather than existing conditions in Alaska. The proving of homesteads as an investment, the misinformation released from the Territory painting this country in too glowing colors, the lack of sufficient capital to last through that early period of land clearance and establishing of economic security, are important contributing factors which forced individuals and families to desert their homesteads and return to their former homes. During the war many men left Alaska for the purpose of enlistment and never returned. These lands reverted to the Territory.

Mosquitoes are an additional difficulty. From June through September they are present in large quantities. Within the clearing of the land mosquitoes frequently disappear, but they are a force to be reckoned with, especially for the first few years.

Dairying, trucking, and commercial distribution of meat products should be more than sufficiently successful to allow these families to amortize their debts over a reasonable period of time, supplying them during this interim with a comfortable living and guaranteeing future security for them and their children.

JUNE 24, 1935.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pursuant to Senate Resolution 158, adopted on Friday, June 21, I have the honor to present herewith the following report respecting the Alaskan colonization project being carried out under the direction of this administration.

1. Present status of the colonization, including numbers and descriptions of persons transported to Alaska, and from what States.

(a) Present status of colonization: The decision to undertake this project was made on March 1, 1935. A chronological statement of the progress of the project is set forth in exhibit A which is attached to this letter. Since March 1 all plans for the project have been made and approved. All workmen and colonists have been selected and have been transported to the site of the project. In addition, tools, equipment, livestock, groceries, household supplies, etc., have been transported to the project.

It should be noted that all materials and supplies required for subsistence and maintenance, as well as for construction, had to be procured in the United States and transported to Alaska.

All plans for the project have been executed according to predetermined schedule with the exception of the actual construction work. Construction activities, as a whole, are approximately 3 weeks behind schedule. This delay has been caused by abnormally rainy weather, some delay in the arrival of materials, and of administrative difficulties which were encountered on the job. Materials are now arriving satisfactorily. Action has been taken to correct administrative difficulties, and a sufficient number of additional workers have been engaged to make up for the time lost to date.

The very nature of the project, its distance from sources of supply, the short working season, and the hazards of weather make it impossible to give positive assurance that all construction will be completed according to schedule.

It is possible, however, to give full assurance that facilities providing safe and reasonably comfortable living conditions will be completed before winter.

Photographs marked "exhibit B" will give some idea of initial construction activities. The latest of these photographs are dated June 5, only 2 or 3 weeks after the arrival of the majority of the colonists. Considerable progress has been made since that date.

(b) Number and description of persons transported to Alaska: A total of 1,336 persons have been transported to Alaska in connection with this project, divided as follows: Transient workers, 425; colonists, including members of families, 897; administrative and supervisory workers, 14.

The transient workers were selected from approximately 10,000 transients on relief in California. They were chosen for their skill in construction. While a few of these persons have become dissatisfied and have left, they have as a body rendered excellent service, working without regard for hours and maintaining a high morale. Their relief pay is $1 per day and board.

The colonists, 201 families in all, were drawn from relief rolls of the stranded lumbering and mining areas of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. Sixty-seven came from Michigan, 68 from Wisconsin, and 66 from Minnesota. From 30 to 50 percent of the entire population in these areas are on relief; and because the lumbering and mining industries, which formerly supplied work in these areas, have definitely abandoned them, there is little prospect for general reemployment in them. (See exhibit C showing relief conditions in these areas.)

The families were selected by experienced case workers on the basis of vigor, self-reliance, familiarity with hardships and hard work, and their adaptability to climatic conditions. Less than 5 percent of all colonists are more than 40 years old. (See classification by age marked "exhibit D", and see also various photographs of colonists themselves, marked "exhibit E." The detailed description of the Minnesota families given in exhibit D may be taken as typical of those selected from the other States.)

It should be borne in mind that these families were definitely stranded where they were and totally dependent upon the Government for their living. They had almost no hope of employment and were degenerating into a complacent acceptance of definitely subnormal social and economic standards. Photographs indicating their former environment are marked "exhibit F."

2. Nature and extent of accommodations provided for colonists.

(a) Existing accommodations.

(1) Living quarters: Pending completion of their permanent homes, colonists are living in floored tents, boarded on the sides and equipped with stoves, beds, cooking utensils, mosquito netting, and gasoline lamps. Tents are divided into nine separate groups so that colonists may have access to their individual tracts of land on which they are working. (See photographs of living quarters marked "exhibit B.")

(2) Sanitation: Pit toilets of the type used generally in transient camps of the United States have been constructed under the direction of the community doctor. Garbage cans and disposal pits are strictly required to be used by the colonists. Water was provided at first through shipment in tank cars from Anchorage, but wells are being rapidly developed and most of the water, which is pure and wholesome, is now coming from these wells. (See photographs marked "exhibits G and H.")

(3) Medical facilities: An emergency hospital is maintained in 4 tents with 1 doctor, 4 hospital orderlies, 1 public-health nurse, and 3 visiting nurses on duty. Hospitalization for serious cases and any supplementary medical attention which might be needed are available at Anchorage, 40 miles away, and directly connected by rail. The American Red Cross is cooperating in the provision of medical facilities. (See exhibit I.)

(4) Subsistence: Groceries and meat and other supplies are available in a central commissary and in the six branch commissaries, one for each group of tents. Food supplies were prescribed by experienced dieticians, and while there may not be the variety afforded in shops in the average city of the United States proper, there is full confidence that dietary needs are adequately met. For instance, such diverse commodities as milk, flour, cereals, potatoes, tomatoes, leafy green and yellow vegetables, dried fruits, other vegetables and fruits, dried beans, peas, and nuts, butter, etc., sugar, meat, and eggs are available. The costs of the food furnished the colonists are charged to them along with the other items of cost. In some cases the cost of the food may be high, but if so it is because of the high cost of transportation. Because of this fact, in connection with work which the colonists do on community projects, wages commensurate with such high costs are paid.

(5) Transportation: There are few good roads available. New roads are under construction as a part of the project. There is direct rail connection with Anchorage, 40 miles away, and with Seward, the port, 125 miles distant.

(6) Community life: A community house accommodating 200 people has been built, and community entertainment and recreation are being developed. Religious services are held regularly. See photograph marked "Exhibit J."

(b) Proposed accommodations:

(1) Plans for homes and community buildings to be constructed for the colonists are shown in exhibit K. The homes will be completed first, in order that living quarters for the winter be assured. Other construction will be given priority in the order of its importance to the safety and comfort of the colonists.

(2) Land: Each family will receive 40 acres of land, most of which the family will have to clear itself. This is Government land, formerly open for homesteading and withdrawn by the President to permit its use in connection with this project. See exhibit L.

(3) Schools: Plans for school buildings are indicated in the subjoined exhibits. The teaching staff will be provided by the Territory, and educational authorities have indicated that they will be ready to operate this coming term. (See exhibit M.)

(4) Farming equipment and livestock: The project is being managed by the former director of the Alaska Experiment Station, and the livestock and farming equipment provided the colonists were prescribed by him. Stock and equipment have already been delivered, and farming operations on a small scale, particularly gardening, have already begun. (See exhibit N.)

3. Any information available respecting lack of facilities and supplies necessary to protection and life.

Radio reports are received by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration every 2 or 3 days from the administrator of the project in Alaska. Some sickness has been reported among the children, such as measles and mumps. There have been numerous colds among the adults, but no cases of serious illness have been reported. As stated above, careful provision has been made for sanitation and medical attention.

The only complaint which has been received directly by this Administration has been a telegram signed by Patrick J. Hemmer and Mrs. I. M. Sandivick, who are colonists. This telegram is attached as exhibit O. The principal complaint contained in this telegram is that the construction of houses, wells, and roads has not progressed satisfactorily and that local political influences are interfering with the project. As stated above, it is true that there have been delays in construction and local administrative interferences. Corrective measures have been taken in both instances.

The telegram further complains that Government food has not been delivered. Information received in Washington indicates that there is now a supply of food on hand adequate to furnish a diet of the character indicated above. It should be noted that the telegram makes no criticism of the administrator, Irwin, or Washington officials, both of whom are described as being "O. K."

The great publicity which has been given to this undertaking has made news and headlines out of the very ordinary difficulties of construction and administration which would normally be expected in an enterprise of similar nature, even if undertaken in a well-settled part of the United States. Certain newspaper reports are clearly without foundation. Thus an article purports to quote one of the colonists as saying that 2,000 persons are ill. This is the only evidence, official or otherwise, of any unusual sickness. There are only 1,336 persons in the colony all told. Radio reports received from the administrator of the project have not mentioned any unusual sickness or lack of medical supplies or facilities. It is therefore believed that no credence can be given to this report. Nevertheless, a radio request for specific information on this point has been sent to the administrator, and his reply will be transmitted to you as soon as received.

The administrative difficulties hereinbefore referred to have unquestionably caused the majority of the complaints appearing in the press and transmitted to Members of the Senate. As has already been stated, appropriate and effective measures have been taken to remove these difficulties. The last radio report from Administrator Irwin, under date of June 21, attached and marked "Exhibit P", indicates satisfactory progress and conditions.

4. Nature and extent of the present and prospective expenditures in this connection.

The total estimated cost of the Alaskan colonization project is $1,093,365.

Nine hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars has already been granted by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, leaving a balance of $161,365 to be made available for the completion of this project. There is a complete summary of the estimated costs of this project set forth in exhibit Q.

Of the total estimated cost of $1,093,365, it is calculated that approximately $700,000 will be charged to the individual colonists under a contract to make repayment in 30 years. The form of contract used in this connection is attached as exhibit R. The remainder of the estimated cost will be amortized through service charges or will simply represent an increase in the value of the property belonging to the Territory of Alaska.

5. The Alaskan colonization project was undertaken only after very serious and mature consideration of the economic and other problems involved. On the basis of the figures indicated above, the cost to each family would be approximately $190 per year, the full payment being made at the end of 25 years. During such time each family will have been cultivating its homestead, developing such diverse crops as hay, pea vines, garden vegetables, barley, oats, and the raising of pigs, cattle, and other livestock.

The commercial value of the crops, commodities, and livestock to be developed by each family will probably yield an annual income at the end of the fifth year of approximately $500, which would be in addition to the gardening crops and dairy products available for each family, which could be said to be worth over $600 at the end of such fifth year. Thus, in addition to being able to pay off its current indebtedness, each family at the end of the fifth year will have a credit balance of about $300.

Of course, after full payment has been made, the colonists will be able to retain the full benefits of the value of the crops developed on the homestead. This economic situation should be compared with the fact that if the families, which have been moved to the Matanuska Valley, had been left in the regions from which they have come, their sole outlook would have been to have received from emergency relief aid approximately $25 per month for each family. Because of economic conditions in the areas from which they have come, there was no hope of any economic recovery as compared to the opportunities which are now afforded to them by virtue of the Alaskan colonization project.

Attention is invited to the F. E. R. A. Bulletin 4906, attached as exhibit S, describing the project for the information of the prospective colonists and to a pamphlet issued by the Department of the Interior, attached as exhibit T–1, outlining colonization possibilities and to a speech given by the Honorable ANTHONY J. DIMOND in the House of Representatives on May 14, 1935, in connection with the Matanuska Valley colonization project in Alaska attached as exhibit T–2.

The Alaska colonization project, when completed and in successful operation, will offer a new frontier of vast extent in Alaska available to citizens of the United States. Many millions of dollars will thus be added to the national wealth and for many persons who should be rehabilitated, there may be made available a basis for economic recovery and new faith.

Additional information desired in connection with this undertaking will be gladly furnished by this Administration.

Respectfully submitted.

EXTENSION OF TEMPORARY DEPOSIT-INSURANCE PLAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended (1) by striking out "July 1, 1935", wherever it appears in subsections (e), (l), and (y), and inserting in lieu thereof "August 31, 1935"; and (2) by striking out "June 30, 1935", where it appears in the first sentence of the eighth paragraph of subsection (y), and inserting in lieu thereof "August 31, 1935"; and (3) by adding to subsection (y) the following additional paragraph, "The deposits in banks which are on June 30, 1935, members of the fund or the fund for mutuals shall continue to be insured during such extended period to August 31, 1935, without liability on the part of such banks to further calls or assessment."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, when Senate Joint Resolution 152, to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, was passed, the Committee on Banking and Currency did not know and could not know when consideration of the bank bill would be completed, if at all. I am happy to announce that the subcommittee having the proposed legislation in charge has practically agreed on all the main points of the bill and the chairman of the full committee has been notified that the subcommittee would report to the full committee on Monday. Within a few days we hope to report the completed bill to the Senate.

That being so, there is no material reason why the provisions of the law covered by Senate Joint Resolution 152 should be extended beyond the 60-day period proposed by the House, and therefore I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I submit a concurrent resolution merely to correct the title of a joint resolution that was passed earlier in the afternoon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 19) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, to amend the title thereof by striking out the words "for 1 year" and inserting in lieu thereof "to August 31, 1935."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I think it is the first time I have ever availed myself of this privilege since I have been in the Senate. I hope it will be the last time.

On June 5, in their night editions, the Washington Herald and the Washington Post, with flaming headlines on the first page, carried articles about my being in a boat accident on the Potomac River in company with two ladies, and that all the parties refused to give their names.

This was a falsehood out of the whole cloth so far as I am concerned. I was on no boat on the Potomac with anybody. I have had the matter examined by the superintendent of police, Major Brown, and he has reported to me, with full evidence of the facts, that it was Representative KENT KELLER, of Illinois, who was on the boat. I gave Representative KELLER himself the opportunity to make the correction. He declined to do so, saying he was not on the boat. I am, therefore, forced to make the correction and declare the absolute untruth of the two articles, and similar ones in other newspapers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1935

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful and ever-living God, from whom all blessings flow, abandon none of us; love us, help us, and trust us. We are here to work, perform a mission, and to be servants of the people. We do not pray for an easy way nor for a lighter burden, but for strength and courage to meet our tasks. We beseech Thee for an increase of knowledge, for widening horizons, for deepening thought, and for the culture of conscience. Heavenly Father, make our whole land to arise and go forward, and may its music and splendor fall upon our delighted senses. Enable us to see that our hearts are free from all jealousy, all selfishness, and all bitterness. O let the divine spirit emerge and help us to constantly seek the good of our generation, soften sorrow, lighten the heavy loads of human experience, and hasten on the better days. Through Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my point of order.

REVENUE ACT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 324, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the chairman a question as to the differences between the House and the Senate on this bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The difference between the two Houses is that the Senate added an amendment reducing the time from 2 years to 1 year. That is the only change that was made.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, am I in order to move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at this stage of the bill.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. DOUGHTON, SAMUEL B. HILL, CULLEN, TREADWAY, and BACHARACH.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas insist upon his point of no quorum?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 106]

Bacon	Dingell	Kennedy, Md.	Peyser
Bankhead	Ditter	Kopplemann	Polk
Brooks	Dondero	Lambertson	Quinn
Buckley, N. Y.	Doutrich	Lamneck, Ohio	Ryan

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy-seven Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1935

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill (H. R. 8555) to develop a strong merchant marine to promote the commerce of the United States, to aid national defense, and for other purposes, which was under consideration on yesterday.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MICHENER (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, if the further reading of the bill is dispensed with, that will in no matter affect a roll call on the bill, will it?

The SPEAKER. Not if the House wishes a roll call.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Inasmuch as it is quite apparent there will be no effort whatever made to get a roll call——

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair states to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. We want one.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, in view of that status, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with; we can get a roll call on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McFARLANE and Mr. O'MALLEY objected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFARLANE and Mr. O'MALLEY) there were—ayes 145, noes 131.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maine rise?

Mr. BREWSTER. To propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The Clerk had already begun the calling of the roll and had called the first name, "ALLEN." I make the point of order the gentleman from Maine cannot interrupt the roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to propound a legitimate parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair presumes that the inquiry propounded is a proper one. The gentleman from Maine will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that a motion to recommit cannot be submitted at this stage?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is not in order at this time.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 194, nays 186, not voting 49, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I trust this Nation will always remember the indignities it suffered prior to our entrance into the World War because of the defenseless position we were in because of the lack of national defense.

I heartily endorse the Bland bill—H. R. 8555—reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I have the honor to be a member. In my opinion, the bill is meritorious, it is forward looking, and when enacted into law it will prove of much benefit to the United States in the future.

Why is it necessary to subsidize a merchant marine and why do we need a merchant marine? In the first place, if we do not subsidize a merchant marine our Nation will either be without merchant ships or they will be built in other countries because of the differential in cost price. It is known to cost approximately one-half more to build a ship in America than it does overseas because of better living conditions in the United States and higher wages here paid, which is as it should be. By building ships in the United States we thereby use, for the most part, materials produced in the United States and with American labor. Ninety percent of the cost goes to labor in some form or another, either in the mine, mill, or shipyard, and 10 percent goes back to the original raw material. It is far better that all of this be employed and used in the United States and in our shipyards than abroad.

If we do not subsidize American shipping we will soon again find ourselves in the condition that existed prior to and during the World War when we only carried 8 to 10 percent of American products in ships of the United States. When the war enveloped us those ships were withdrawn from our service and for months our products wasted and rotted in the fields; and merchandise that was shipped was forced to pay tremendous increases amounting to as high as 1,000 percent, and all in all cost the United States and its citizens many hundreds of millions of dollars. That condition can obtain again just as easily as it did in 1914 to 1918. Using a homely illustration, there is just as much reason for a farmer to hire and rent his machinery, equipment, horses, mules, tractors, combines, and so forth, as it is for the United States to hire ships from other nations.

The above reasons I consider alone of sufficient interest to warrant our building a merchant marine. I want to cite another reason, however, that in itself I consider alone as abundant justification for an adequate and sizable merchant marine owned by the people of the United States and one that can be had and used in case of war or other emergency by the Federal Government. An adequate merchant marine is a positive necessity for national defense and for the protection of our country in case of war. The opposition to this bill, which developed in the House, it would appear, veiled or otherwise, is from two sources: First, those who want to again experiment with Government ownership of our merchant marine. This has been found and proven expensive and did not work for the good of our country and had to be abandoned and the ships were sold. The other line of thought seems to be pacifist ideas. I decry both pacifist and militarist ideas. I am just as far removed from one as I am from the other. We do not need either militarist or pacifist thought in this country, but what we do need is adequate and abundant national defense and in building for national defense and national security we not only need a sizable, modern, up-to-date Navy and air defense, but for auxiliaries in event of war or in event of attack a sufficient merchant marine.

In opposing militarist ideas I do it for the reason that they would drag us into conflicts which usually are unnecessary and would take us away from our shores or away from our possessions to fight, to which I am bitterly opposed. I am opposed to pacifists' foolish ideas for the reason that they would leave us, if they had their way, totally unarmed, totally unprepared to defend ourselves in case of attack. With the world seething as it is at this time and with all Europe apparently ready to go at each other's throats, why should this Nation be so foolish as to again allow itself to become and be found in the position it was at the beginning of the World War. Will we sit or supinely rest on our oars and hug and cherish the delusive, fantastic ideas that because we are peaceful and peace loving we would be free from attack and free from invasion by other nations if they found and saw our defenseless position. We will not allow ourselves to continue thus.

It will be impossible to have any measure or for any proposed bill to have any more careful, unbiased, and open consideration with fairness to all witnesses and to all members of the committee than was shown by Mr. BLAND, chairman of this committee, and by Mr. LEHLBACH, ranking minority member. Any statements to the contrary notwithstanding, I brand as either willful or ignorant misstatements of fact. I speak with knowledge, having sat in on almost all sessions, both the public hearings, which continued for many weeks, and also the executive sessions when the final draft of the bill was made.

DINNER OF THE CHEMUNG COUNTY, N. Y., DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech made by the Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address on Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic national committee, at a dinner of the Chemung County Democratic committee, at Elmira, N. Y., Monday evening, June 24, 1935:

It is always a pleasure to talk to the people of my own State. They know me, and I know them. They are aware of the political principles that I maintain, and I am no less aware of the reactions and the forces, both for and against those principles that move the Empire State in its political decisions. I think I am justified in claiming that New York is intrinsically a Democratic State. I think I am correct in stating that more New York Governors have been chosen to represent their party in Presidential races than any other State, which simply means that we have had a great number of Governors whose qualifications so impressed the country that both the big parties have been glad to put them up for the highest office in the land. Another factor that must impress the readers of history is that New York has never given the country a President whose administration has not been successful.

That's a pretty good record, and I think you will all agree with me that the present tenant of the White House is carrying on this splendid tradition.

These reflections naturally may lead us to the consideration of the contemporary political situation. It goes without saying that Franklin Delano Roosevelt will be renominated and reelected.

The reasons for this statement are twofold. In the first place, he has accomplished an almost superhuman task in reviving the languishing and near moribund industries he found on his advent to the White House into the greatly improved and sound condition in which they find themselves today. He has done this by the exercise of an intelligent plan, and we have come through the crisis without riots or other social disturbances, without the imposition of any dictatorial measures. He has done it all right out in the open, taking the public into his confidence as he went along. He has minimized unemployment. In fact, you can use whatever yardstick you please and learn that the country is immensely better off because of our President's courage and resourcefulness.

That's the economic side of it. The political side of it is that despite all the criticism and clamor raised by the opposition, the Republicans have not advanced anything approaching a program to take the place of the program President Roosevelt devised and has been carrying out. Moreover, though they have combed the ranks of the G. O. P. they have not developed a possible contender for the Presidency as against our leader. I don't think that any of us has heard a single name advanced as an acceptable recipient of the G. O. P. nomination in 1936. The opposition party is hopelessly divided. There is the standpat crowd, who would like to see the country go back to the policies or lack of policies prevailing before March 4, 1933, and which consequently has in mind some reactionary of the old school to whom every progressive act and progressive name is accursed.

They have the so-called "Progressive wing", typified by the La Follettes, who insist that the hoary, hidebound organization shall change its habits of thought and action and offer to the country something approaching the Roosevelt new deal. I suppose I ought to include among the Republican factions a shadowy third element that calls itself Progressive but shies away from La Follette. This element doesn't like the new deal; doesn't like the President; doesn't like the Hoover wing. It is always vehement in its objections to the G. O. P. policies until election time, when it supports the G. O. P. presidential candidate.

Recently some of the Midwest Republican leaders organized and held what they described as a "grass roots" convention. It was to me one of the most interesting, not to say amusing, political gatherings that we have ever had. Dominated by the standpatters, with the Hoover hand over everything, it did not dare even to mention the ex-President's name in its proceedings. Held in a section of the country most vehement in its demand that the reactionary element show some consideration for the progressive sentiment, it could not voice the policies of the Republican national chairman, of the Hoover cabinet members who were conspicuous, or of Mr. Frank Smith, whose Insull contributions and affiliations were so rank that a Republican Senate refused him a seat to which he was elected.

It had to compromise on a fierce attack on President Roosevelt and a declaration of principles which closely parallel the new-deal policies inaugurated and put into effect by President Roosevelt.

I note by the newspapers that our old friend W. Kingsland Macy, former chairman of the New York Republican State Committee, has been to Washington to consult with the progressive members of his party, campaigning for some sort of a gathering to take the curse off the "grass roots" convention. Mr. Macy was suggesting a Progressive Republican convention, free of the Hoover influence. I think that all good Democrats should cheer him on his way, because the new movement reveals the lack of Republican harmony and emphasizes the irreconcilable family differences to the public in a manner which no Democratic propaganda could hope to match. I venture to say that the platform of the "anti-grass-roots" convention—if it ever assembles—will be fit to frame alongside of the Springfield efforts. Each will be just as vague, just as dishonest, as the other.

Republicans of every shade, from the pink Progressives to the dark blue of the reactionaries, derive a great deal of comfort, and whatever hope they have, from the recent Supreme Court decision against the National Recovery Act. Naturally, every person who has followed the progress of the recovery movement was disappointed at the Court's ruling. But the Supreme Court is the Supreme Court and there is nothing to be done but to follow the course outlined by the President and do what we can under the restrictions laid down by that tribunal.

Just the same, there is a certain amount of satisfaction in the circumstance that the N. R. A. functioned for 2 years and in that time was able to give an impetus to business, the momentum of which will carry us through to the goal to which the Democratic Party directed itself when it came into Federal power. We cannot hope that the recovery will be as rapid as it would have been had the constitutionality of the N. R. A. not been determined adversely. But the seed the N. R. A. has planted has obtained such a growth that public sentiment will not permit all the good to be lost.

Not long ago in a similar situation, the President told a story to the Washington correspondents at one of the regular White House press conferences. It concerned a New York town. On the edge of that town there was a bad grade crossing that had caused a considerable number of collisions and casualties. So the town authorities appointed a constable to mount guard at the crossing. After 2 years a court decided that the wrong civil authority had made the appointment and that, therefore, the presence of the constable was unconstitutional—otherwise, invalid. Nevertheless, the man had watched the crossing for 2 years and had been the means of saving a number of lives.

So it is with the N. R. A. The Supreme Court ruled that the Congress had exceeded its authority in enacting the measure, but for the 2 years the N. R. A. had functioned it had put a lot of men to work, had abolished child labor, had cleared industry of the disgrace of sweatshops, and had established a code of ethics in business and rules of fair competition that really lifted us out of the depths of depression and started us on the way to the high ground of prosperity. The principle may have been wrong, judicially considered, but it was eminently right from the humanitarian and utilitarian points of view.

That suggests a look at some of the things the President's recovery program has accomplished. For example, in the 12 years prior to 1933 there was an average of 15,000 bank suspensions, with deposits in excess of $5,000,000,000. Since the act creating the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation 2 years ago, under which more than 50,000,000 depositors are insured up to $5,000, only 17 banks—2 of them national—have closed their doors. Ninety-five percent of the deposits were fully insured, and the depositors were paid as rapidly as they presented their claims. For the year 1934 the insurance fund, after paying all the depositors and the expenses of operation, had a surplus of $2,000,000. This is one example of what the new deal has accomplished.

Now let's look into the unemployment question. According to the report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, "in 1932, 39 out of each 100 workers employed in manufacturing industries had been displaced and by January of 1933, 43 out of each 100. Many then employed were working part time. By January 1934, 13 of the 43 had been reemployed, and by January 1935, 18. The comparisons must be qualified by the fact that more persons were of working age and therefore a larger proportion needed jobs in 1935 than in 1929."

The report puts the same situation into dollars. Each $100 wage payment made by employers in 1929 was reduced to $42 in 1932 and to $36 in January 1933. The next January found that the ratio had increased to $50, and by the first of the current year to $59. And in this figuring remember the emergency employment and pay rolls furnished by public funds are not included.

In other words, N. R. A. had lifted the earning capacity of employees from $36 to $59 on every hundred and had brought reemployment to nearly 60 percent of those out of work.

All of this may have been unconstitutional, but there are about 7,000,000 people and their dependents to whom it meant salvation, and I do not think that any of them is worrying over the constitutionality of it.

Now let's take a few figures on the employers' side and see how they fared under the codes, which the enemies of the administration have described as horrible examples of regimentation of industry and the shackling of trade. We have recently had the reports to the stockholders from the three major steel companies. The United States Steel Corporation for the past 3 months showed sharp gains in both income and employment over a year ago. In continuing its quarterly dividend, United States Steel reported that its deficit for the first quarter of 1935 was $3,975,206, as compared with a deficit of $8,791,370 for the corresponding quarter last year. National Steel's net earnings were $3,367,632 for the 3 months, which is more than double what they were in the like period last year. And Inland Steel, which earned a net $1,104,000 in January–February–March of 1934, announces that this year those earnings amounted to $2,465,000.

Labor shared in this increase in income, for the average weekly earnings of workers in the steel industry was 22 percent higher than in the first 3 months of last year.

Not so bad for the N. R. A., even if it was all deplorably unconstitutional.

The automobile business is another example. They are selling more machines than at any time in their history. Their pay rolls have increased 131 percent over 1932 and are now being paid at the 1929 rate, when we were in the midst of the boom that preceded the giant collapse.

You have heard a lot from the assailants of the administration and the national-recovery movement about the doleful fate of small business. Well, our old friend, Dun & Bradstreet, gives us the answer. That firm recently announced that retail sales in cities of 30,000 and less increased 21 percent during the first year of N. R. A., while the larger distributors, such as department stores and mail-order firms, showed increases of 13 percent during the same period.

The Department of Commerce reports and those of the National Retail Drygoods Association both point out that in spite of the tremendous number of failures between 1929 and 1933 there are more retail establishments doing business in the United States than there were during the peak of the boom. Moreover, Dun & Bradstreet show that there have been fewer business failures during the N. R. A. regime throughout the United States than at any time since 1920.

It is perfectly obvious from these figures that the story of the sacrifice of small business for big business is an absolute myth. There are more small businesses than ever and the percentage of failures among them is less than it has been for 15 years.

Let us take the situation from another point of view. The most unfailing index to the country's prosperity is furnished by the tax returns. Well, up to the 1st of June 1935 the income-tax receipts exceeded those of last year by more than $200,000,000. Now if you will figure what proportion of your income you paid in income taxes you will get an approximation of the enormous increase that has come to the Nation's business to account for $200,000,000 more taxes paid than last year. Miscellaneous internal revenues also show an increase of nearly $200,000,000, which gives you a line on the revenue of those industries subject to these special taxes.

The Department of the Government with which I am connected reflects the same state of affairs. Our postal receipts for the first 10 months of the present fiscal year were 10⅓ percent up in the smaller post offices of the country and 6 percent up in the larger offices. Our April record showed the best postal increases in 5 years.

When sales go down, business houses that furnish the bulk of the postal activities send out fewer letters, fewer packages, fewer bills, fewer circulars. When business goes up, the mail records show a sympathetic and simultaneous reflection of the improvement. Incidentally, it is largely this circumstance of the growth of the postal business that explains why that Department is now producing a surplus instead of a deficit, which in past years has gone as high as $150,000,000. By a surplus I mean the excess of income over expenditure, of course, not including the payment of such subsidies as go to ships for the encouragement of the merchant marine or to aircraft for the encouragement of aviation, or for the free service to every branch of the Government over which the Department has no control. The subsidies are voted by Congress, and the post office merely happens to be the disbursing agent of those appropriations.

According to those who seek to pick flaws in the Roosevelt administration, it has done something terrible to our credit and to our finances. Well, the American dollar is at a premium in terms of nearly every other national currency. As to our credit, let the Standard Statistics Co. of New York tell the story. According to them the yearly averages of Government bond prices have increased from 100.1 in 1929 to 106.3 in 1935. This, of course, represents the average of all Government bonds.

So you see we got along pretty well under the N. R. A. The purpose and the courage and the definiteness of view all contributed to the advancement of our country and to its recovery from the swamp of depression in which the Roosevelt administration found it when it came to Washington. It is regrettable that in the emergency and need for extraordinary remedies we proceeded outside of the strict legal interpretation of the powers of Congress.

However, I cannot find that this departure injured anybody, either materially or by an affront to his personal liberty. In fact, every newspaper you pick up nowadays contains in its columns some sort of lament from business and from labor that the helpful codes under which they functioned so well have been placed outside the law. Thousands of industries have indicated that they will try to make code observance a matter of mutual agreement, so that the good work can go on as steadily as possible in the new situation.

Do any of you think that in the histories to be written in the future Franklin D. Roosevelt will be remembered because the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the program he adopted to meet the depression or because through his valiant, prompt, and effective plan he gave the country a 2-year breathing spell—gave it a chance to catch its breath so that it could go on toward the height on which dwell prosperity and contentment?

DEATH OF EDWARD J. ROCHE

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order that we might pause a moment to pay a tribute of respect to one of our oldest employees who has just passed on—Edward J. Roche, of New York. Fifty years ago we had a distinguished Congressman from the city of New York named Timothy John Campbell. He was a unique character, and it was he who appointed Edward Roche as a page boy at that time.

I may say in passing that the same Congressman Campbell was the author of the celebrated expression we hear so often repeated when he said to President Grover Cleveland, "What is the Constitution between friends?"

Edward Roche served in various official capacities, including service with the Government Printing Office for 30 years. He was one of the secretaries to the former Secretary of the Treasury Ogden L. Mills when that gentleman was a Member of this House. He was a splendid character, and he took a leading part in all organized-labor activities and was a delegate to many of their national conventions. He worked hard for the passage of the Saturday half holiday and the present retirement bills. Loyalty and faithfulness to his friends characterized his entire life, and I know the Membership of the House will join with me in wishing peace to his soul and rest to his ashes.

GOLD-CLAUSE BONDS OF THE GOVERNMENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 232)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Before the termination of this session of the Congress I believe that it is important that definite action be taken to eliminate any uncertainty with respect to the right of holders of gold-clause bonds of the Government to sue for payment either in gold or else in legal tender with an additional sum of 69 cents on every dollar.

To this end I urge the withdrawal by the United States of its consent to be sued upon its currency or securities. The question of the effect of the so-called "gold clause", in the light of the monetary legislation of the Seventy-third Congress, came before the Supreme Court at the term just closed. A suit for additional payment under existing circumstances, the Court said, would "constitute not a recoupment of loss in any proper sense but an unjustified enrichment." Bonds of the United States containing gold clauses—all of them issued, sold, and payable wholly within the United States—have been continuously quoted on the exchanges at no higher prices than bonds not containing such clauses. But the continuing possibility of actions by litigious persons leaves open the continuing possibility of speculation. There is no public interest, under these conditions, in permitting a handful of private litigants to exploit the general public in the hope of a wholly speculative private profit.

This conclusion will hold so long as the Congress adheres to its declared policy, now more than a third of a century old, to maintain the equal value of every dollar in the market.

I recommend, therefore, the enactment of legislation which will make clear that it is our fixed policy to continue to treat the bondholders of all our securities equally and uniformly, to afford any holder of any gold-clause security who thinks he could by any possibility sustain any loss in the future an opportunity to put himself immediately in a position to avoid such future loss, and to remove all possibility of any suits designed to hamper the Government in administering the public debt and in financing its ordinary and emergency expenditures.

More specifically, I recommend the immediate enactment of legislation (1) that will authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of the holders of gold-clause securities of the United States, to make payment therefor in cash, dollar for dollar, with accrued interest, or, at the holder's election, to exchange such securities for non-gold-clause securities with the same interest rate and maturity; (2) that will terminate any consent which the United States may have voluntarily given to be sued on its securities, coins, or currencies; and (3) that will reaffirm the fixed policy of the United States to make payment to all holders of its securities, coins, and currencies on an equal and uniform dollar-for-dollar basis and will make appropriations available for payments on this basis and on this basis only.

There is no constitutional or inherent right to sue the Government; on the contrary, the immunity of the sovereign from suit is a principle of universal acceptance, and permission to bring such suits is an act of grace, which with us may be granted or withheld by the Congress. The courts, it is hardly necessary for me to add, will always be open to those who seek justice, but they were not established for use by a few to enrich themselves at the expense of the many, nor to enable a few to harass and embarrass sovereign action by the Government when taken for the benefit of all.

Not only justice to the holders of our currency and of our securities who support and rely on our policy of equal and uniform treatment to all but also the interests of our entire people require that the Government of the United States make it clear that it cannot and will not consent to the use of its courts in aid of efforts to sabotage the operations of Government or in aid of private speculation.

This proposal reasserts and makes definite the control of the Congress over the securities and money issued by the United States of America.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 27, 1935.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8021) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended as to each of such amendments in the accompanying conference report, namely:

Senate

On amendment no. 11: Inserts the correct name of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment no. 33: Appropriates $61,094 and makes $754 of that sum immediately available, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $57,323, as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 34: Appropriates $150,000 for inquiries and investigations, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $120,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 36: Appropriates $200,000 for miscellaneous items, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $100,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 37: Appropriates $10,000 for furniture, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $5,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendment no. 38: Makes a technical correction in the appropriation for stationery for Senators.

House of Representatives

On amendment no. 40: Confines the limitation on appropriations in the bill relating to operation of restaurants to the "House" restaurant, as proposed by the Senate, instead of to "any" restaurant, as proposed by the House.

On amendments nos. 41 and 42: Makes textual changes of form in a limitation on the contingent fund of the House.

Capitol Police

On amendments nos. 43, 44, and 45: Strikes out the increases inserted by the Senate providing for 24 additional privates at $1,620 each and $3,638 additional for their uniforms and equipment.

Architect of the Capitol

On amendment no. 46: Appropriates $316,599, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $311,709, as proposed by the House, for maintenance of the Capitol Building, the increase of $4,800 to provide for four elevator operators.

On amendment no. 47: Appropriates $36,850, as proposed by the Senate, for furnishing and alterations to make certain space vacated by the Supreme Court offices available for use of the office of the financial clerk of the Senate.

On amendment no. 48: Appropriates $8,000, as proposed by the Senate, for enlargement of accommodations for the press in the Senate wing of the Capitol.

On amendment no. 49: Appropriates $1,400 for procurement of four marble busts of Vice Presidents of the United States.

On amendments nos. 50, 51, and 52: Appropriates $266,569 in the manner proposed by the Senate instead of $230,315, as proposed by the House, for maintenance of the Senate Office Building and restores the language, stricken out by the Senate, requiring the Architect of the Capitol to be the executive agent of the Committee on Rules in connection with such building.

On amendment no. 53: Appropriates $572,560, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $528,660, as proposed by the House, for operation of the Capitol power plant.

On amendment no. 54: Strikes out the authority inserted by the Senate making the appropriation for maintenance of the Library Building available for repairs and replacements in the cafe and kitchen of that building; the language is eliminated because prohibitions against such expenditures carried elsewhere in the House bill have been removed and the building maintenance fund becomes available automatically for such purposes in the same manner as it was prior to the imposition of such limitations.

Library of Congress

On amendment no. 55: Appropriates $90,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the House, for the purchase of books for the law library.

LOUIS LUDLOW,
J. BUELL SNYDER,
M. A. ZIONCHECK,
JOHN F. DOCKWEILER,
EDWARD C. MORAN, Jr.,
J. P. BUCHANAN,
D. LANE POWERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUDLOW. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. I wish the gentleman would explain the effect of the amendment with reference to the restaurants.

Mr. LUDLOW. The effect of it is that the legislation that has been carried so long in our appropriation bill is made applicable hereafter only to the House restaurant and as the gentleman will note, there is a separate new provision on page 11 for the Senate restaurant.

Mr. TABER. Does that provide that the same provision shall apply to the Senate restaurant that applies to the House restaurant?

Mr. LUDLOW. It does not; and if the gentleman will read the language on page 11 he will see the difference. There is an appropriation provided for the Senate restaurant and they also insert a provision for an extra charge of 10 percent on each order in excess of 10 cents served in the restaurant and 20 percent on all orders served outside of the restaurant in order to recoup the expenses of the Senate restaurant. This is a different provision and puts the Senate restaurant on a different basis from the House restaurant.

Mr. TABER. It is rumored that there are tremendous credits allowed to the Senators in the Senate restaurant and that they are not paid. Does the gentleman know anything about that situation?

Mr. LUDLOW. I will say to the gentleman that that could in no way come under the cognizance of the conferees. I have heard the rumors that the gentleman refers to, but that is a matter that in no way could come under the jurisdiction of the conferees, the Senate restaurant being under the Senate Committee on Rules and distinctly a Senate matter.

Mr. TABER. It seems to me that practice ought not to exist.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the gentleman quite right, if it does exist.

Mr. TABER. And if we could, we should do something to stop it.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am unable to understand what we could do in this bill, especially on a conference report, with respect to that particular matter. The gentleman is an older legislator than I am, and I defer to his judgment on it. I deplore the situation, if it does exist, just as much as the gentleman does, but I see nothing we can do about it in connection with this report.

Mr. TABER. There is no such situation in our restaurant, as I understand it.

Mr. LUDLOW. That is absolutely true. The House restaurant is conducted aboveboard in every way. Representative LINDSAY WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of Accounts, has made a splendid success in the management of the House restaurant. After a long past of failures and vicissitudes, it is now running "in the black" under Mr. WARREN'S able management, which is quite an achievement, I would say.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that amendments numbered 1 and 2 may be considered together, as they have reference to the same subject matter.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "mileage", insert "of the President of the Senate and."

Amendment no. 2: Page 1, line 11, after "$51,000" insert "and hereafter the President of the Senate shall be paid mileage at the same rate and in the same manner as now allowed by law to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates in Congress."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the two Senate amendments.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. I wish the gentleman would explain this amendment.

Mr. LUDLOW. I shall be pleased to explain it. Every other person associated with the Membership of either House of Congress under the statute receives an allowance for mileage. The only person associated with the Membership who does not receive such an allowance is the President of the Senate. This provision, which was adopted by the Senate and retained by the conferees, puts him in the same status as any other Member, including the Speaker of the House, who receives mileage.

Mr. TABER. This has never been done before?

Mr. LUDLOW. I understand it has not.

Mr. TABER. And the Vice President receives a salary along the line of a Cabinet officer?

Mr. LUDLOW. He receives exactly the same salary as the Speaker receives, and the Speaker, as a Member of the House, receives mileage. The Senate contended, and the conferees agreed, with the contention, that the President of the Senate is rightfully in the same status as any Member of the House or the Senate and in the same status as the Speaker, and therefore it was agreed that he should have mileage along with the others.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, while I have the greatest respect for the Vice President, it seems to me we ought not at this time to add further burdens on the Government, and I think when it comes to a vote on these amendments I shall ask for a division and a roll call.

Mr. LUDLOW. Does not the gentleman think that inasmuch as the Vice President is the presiding officer of the Senate he should have mileage just the same as the Speaker of the House?

Mr. TABER. He is elected Vice President and given the same status and salary as a Cabinet officer. It seems to me that we ought not to upset that.

Mr. LUDLOW. In answer to what the gentleman from New York says, the President of the Senate is in the same situation as Members of the House and Senate—he lives a long distance away, has to pay his expenses going and coming. He lives much farther away from the seat of government than the Speaker, and no one disputes that the Speaker is rightfully entitled to mileage. It does seem to me that in all justice he is entitled to the same mileage that any Member of the House or Senate is. The gentleman from New York is a true economist, and I hope I am one. We stand together and fight shoulder to shoulder for economy in government. I have the greatest respect for him, but I submit that in our zeal for economy we should be careful not to do an injustice.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recede and concur.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that there were 90 ayes and 46 noes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 284, nays 74, not voting 71, as follows:

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to all these amendments, and I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, these amendments provide for 27 new jobs and 5 increases of salary, running into quite a lot of money. It is only 3 or 4 months ago that we created a lot of new jobs. I do not believe that it is becoming to Congress to create new jobs and increase salaries at the present time. I think the motion of the gentleman from Indiana should prevail, and the House should insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments. [Applause.] I hope the vote in the House will be unanimous.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What are these jobs?

Mr. TABER. Clerks, law clerks, messengers, and one messenger's salary is increased.

Mr. LUDLOW. Our subcommittee is in entire harmony with the remarks of the gentleman from New York, and I hope the motion will be adopted unanimously.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 176, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 35: At the top of the page, strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive, which reads: "No part of any appropriation contained in this act, except the appropriations available for heated and lighted space and janitor service and for equipment for restaurants and kitchens, shall be used for the operation of any restaurant."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

For repairs, improvements, equipment, and supplies for Senate kitchens and restaurants, Capitol Building and Senate Office Building, including personal and other services, to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, $35,000: Provided, That said Committee on Rules is hereby authorized and directed hereafter to add a minimum of 10 percent to each order in excess of 10 cents served in the said restaurants and 20 percent to all orders served outside of said restaurants, and the proceeds accruing therefrom shall be placed in a fund to be used in the payment of any deficit incurred in the management of such kitchens and restaurants.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment no. 39: After line 14, on page 12, insert: "Payments from the contingent fund of the Senate for materials and supplies (including fuel) hereafter purchased through the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department shall be made by check upon vouchers approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following conferees:

Messrs. LUDLOW, SNYDER, ZIONCHECK, DOCKWEILER, MORAN, BUCHANAN, and POWERS.

NATIONAL PARK TRUST FUND BOARD

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. 2074, to create a National Park Trust Fund Board, and for other purposes, which has already been passed by the Senate, a similar House bill, H. R. 6734, having been passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2074, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a board is hereby created and established, to be known as the National Park Trust Fund Board (hereinafter referred to as the Board) which shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, the Director of the National Park Service, and two persons appointed by the President for a term of 5 years each (the first appointments being for 3 and 5 years respectively). Three members of the Board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and the Board shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. The Board may adopt rules and regulations in regard to its procedure and the conduct of its business.

No compensation shall be paid to the members of the Board for their services as such members, but they shall be reimbursed for the expenses necessarily incurred by them, out of the income from the fund or funds in connection with which such expenses are incurred.

SEC. 2. The Board is hereby authorized to accept, receive, hold, and administer such gifts or bequests of personal property for the benefit of, or in connection with, the National Park Service, its activities, or its service, as may be approved by the Board, but no such gift or bequest which entails any expenditure not to be met out of the gift, bequest or the income thereof shall be accepted without the consent of Congress.

The moneys or securities composing the trust funds given or bequeathed to the Board shall be receipted for by the Secretary of Treasury, who shall invest, reinvest, or retain investments as the Board may from time to time determine. The income, as and when collected, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States in a trust fund account to be known as the "National Park Trust Fund" subject to disbursement by the Division of Disbursement, Treasury Department, for the purposes in each case specified: Provided, however, That the Board is not authorized to engage in any business, nor shall the Secretary of the Treasury make any investment for account of the Board that may not lawfully be made by a trust company in the District of Columbia, except that the Secretary may make any investments directly authorized by the instrument of gift, and may retain any investments accepted by the Board.

SEC. 3. The Board shall have perpetual succession, with all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee, including the power to sell, except as herein limited, in respect of all property, moneys, or securities which shall be conveyed, transferred, assigned, bequeathed, delivered, or paid over to it for the purposes above specified. The Board may be sued in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, which is hereby given jurisdiction of such suits, for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of any trust accepted by it.

SEC. 4. Nothing in this act shall be construed as prohibiting or restricting the Secretary of the Interior from accepting, in the name of the United States, gifts or bequests of money for immediate disbursement or other property in the interest of the National Park Service, its activities, or its service, as heretofore authorized by law.

SEC. 5. Gifts or bequests to or for the benefit of the National Park Service, including those to the Board, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from all Federal taxes.

SEC. 6. The Board shall submit to the Congress an annual report of the moneys or securities received and held by it and of its operations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 6734) was laid on the table.

PERSHING HALL

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill H. R. 8443 will be laid on the table, a similar Senate bill, 2917, authorizing an appropriation to effect a settlement of the remainder due on Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers and men of the expeditionary forces, and for other purposes, having been passed yesterday.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (S. 1958) to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. In the copy of the bill that is available at the Doorkeeper's desk, it appears that the Ramspeck amendment, which was adopted on page 9728 of the RECORD, has not been printed. Does this appear in the engrossed copy of the bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It does. That was an error on the part of the printing clerk in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. It appears in the engrossed copy of the bill, House amendment no. 11, page 4.

The Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 9, 23, 24, and 25.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"SECTION 1. The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce.

"The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of commerce, and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions, by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries.

"Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to insure to employees the full benefit of their right to self-organization and to collective bargaining, and otherwise to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit or subdivision thereof."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1958) to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, submit the following statement of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The conference agreement accepts the first House amendment, striking out from the caption to section 1 the words "declaration of", so that the caption now reads "findings and policy." The omitted words were superfluous.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to House amendment no. 2, and the conferees agreed upon the same with minor amendments. The House redrafting of section 1 was thought by the conferees to contain a better statement of the jurisdictional basis of the bill. The conference struck out the words "interstate and foreign" modifying the word "commerce", appearing at four places in the section. The word "commerce" is defined in subsection 6 of section 2 as meaning interstate and foreign commerce. It is therefore confusing to use the adjectives "interstate and foreign" in various places in section 1, especially when these adjectives are not consistently used each time the word "commerce" appears in the section. The slight verbal change at the end of section 1 simply uses the plural to conform to the use in the preceding paragraphs of the section and in conformity with the general statement of rights in section 7.

The conference agreement accepted House amendment no. 3 as constituting a more accurate definition of the term "commerce." As originally defined in subsection 6 of section 2 the term included "any transportation or communication relating thereto." This was thought to be too broad a statement.

House amendment no. 4 effects a minor change in subsection 7 of section 2 by removing a tautological phrase. The idea is preserved in the phrase "tending to lead to a labor dispute", etc. The conference agreement accepts this amendment.

When the Senate passed S. 1958 it was assumed that the bill would become a law before June 16, 1935, on which date the National Labor Relations Board created pursuant to Public Resolution 44, Seventy-third Congress, expired. Meanwhile, the President by a new Executive order of June 15, 1935, reestablished and continued the Board in existence pursuant to his authority under title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act as amended. House amendment no. 5 makes it clear that the term "old Board" as defined in subsection 11 of section 2, describes the Board which is at present in existence. This amendment is important in view of the provision at the end of section 4 (b) transferring to the Board to be created by S. 1958 the unexpended funds and appropriations of the old Board. The conference agreement accepts this amendment.

Section 3 (a) of the Senate bill provided: "There is hereby created as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government a board, to be known as the 'National Labor Relations Board'." House amendment no. 6 strikes out the phrase "as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government." The Board as contemplated in the bill is in no sense to be an agency of the executive branch of the Government. It is to have a status similar to that of the Federal Trade Commission, which as the Supreme Court pointed out in the Schechter case, is a quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative body. The conference agreement accepts this amendment.

The conference agreement accepts House amendment no. 7, stating specifically the circumstances under which a member of the Board may be removed. This amendment is desirable in the light of the decision of the Supreme Court in Rathbun v. United States, decided May 27, 1935, involving the removal by the President of Commissioner Humphreys of the Federal Trade Commission. If Congress in creating the Board vests the appointing power in the President, it might be implied that it is intended to vest also in the President a general power of removal as an incident to the power to appoint. This inference is negatived by an express provision stating the conditions under which a member of the Board may be removed. Similar provisions are found in the Railway Labor Act of 1934 and in the Federal Trade Commission Act.

House amendment no. 8 strikes out from section 4 (b) the provision continuing the court proceedings and orders of the old Board. The conference agreement accepts this amendment. All cases of the old Board pending in the courts have already been dropped, at the direction of the Attorney General, in view of the Schechter case, which invalidated the codes of fair competition as having been founded upon an improper delegation of legislative power to the President. Section 7 (a), which was the basis of the old Board's activity, became inoperative, because section 7 (a) was effective only insofar as its provisions were inserted in the codes.

Section 4 (b) of the Senate bill provided that all employees of the old Board should be transferred to and become employees of the Board "without acquiring by such transfer a permanent civil-service status." House amendment numbered 9 proposed to strike out this quoted phrase. The conference agreement rejects the House amendment and reinstates the language of the Senate bill. The result is that all employees of the old Board will be carried over as provided in the Senate bill, but such transfer will not of itself confer a civil-service status upon such employees of the old Board as have not now such status. The conferees thought that employees of the old Board should not be blanketed into the civil service without the usual formalities provided by law.

The conference agreement accepted House amendment no. 10 as constituting a more accurate citation of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

House amendment no. 11, which redrafted section 9 (b), embodied two changes from the Senate bill. The first change undertook to express more explicitly the standards by which the Board is to be guided in deciding what is an appropriate bargaining unit. The conference agreement accepts this part of the amendment. The amendment also added a proviso designed to limit the otherwise broad connotation that might be put upon the phrase "or other unit." The proviso, however, was subject to some misconstructions and the conferees have agreed that the simplest way to deal with the matter is to strike out the undefined phrase "other unit." It was also agreed to insert after "plant unit" the phrase "or subdivision thereof." This was done because the National Labor Relations Board has frequently had occasion to order an election in a unit not as broad as "employer unit", yet not necessarily coincident with the phrases "craft unit" or "plant unit"; for example, the "production and maintenance employees" of a given plant.

House amendment no. 12 inserts the phrase "upon due notice" in section 9 (c) providing for hearings by the Board on the issue of collective bargaining representation. The conference agreement accepted this amendment out of abundant caution, though it would perhaps be implied that a requirement of a hearing includes due notice to the parties.

House amendment no. 13 was accepted by the conference agreement. It is a purely formal matter. The appropriate term for the intervention of a person in a quasi-judicial person is "intervene" rather than "appear." House amendment no. 14 was accepted by the conference agreement as a verbal change to conform with the preceding amendment.

Section 10 (e) of the Senate bill provided that "if such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may" petition any circuit court of appeals, etc. House amendment no. 15 strikes out the quoted phrase and substitutes "The Board shall have power to" petition any circuit court of appeals, etc. The conference agreement accepts this amendment. The purpose is to provide for more expeditious procedure. Delay in enforcement procedure due to technicalities would be especially harmful under this act. It is the purpose of this amendment to authorize the Board to apply to the courts for an enforcement order, without encountering the delay resulting from certain court decisions (a small minority) under the Federal Trade Commission Act, requiring the Commission to show in every case that its order is being disobeyed before the court will even proceed to consider the matter on its merits, or render a decree enforcing the Board's order. As the majority of courts have declared under the Federal Trade Commission Act, neither the administrative body nor the courts are required to assume in the ordinary case that the unlawful practice in question, even though presently terminated, will not be resumed in the future. If such practice is resumed, there will be immediately available to the Board an existing court decree to serve as a basis for contempt proceedings.

House amendment no. 16 was accepted in the conference agreement as conforming to the language of the Federal Trade Commission Act, in using the language of authorization rather than mandatory language in empowering the court to enter the appropriate decree.

House amendment no. 17 is clarifying language to cover the contingency where the court has occasion to modify an order of the Board. In such case the court is given by the amendment the power to enforce the Board's order as modified, as fully as in the case where the court affirms the Board's order without modification.

The conference agreement accepts House amendment no. 18. This amendment to section 10 (f), applying to a case where a party petitions the circuit court of appeals to review the order of the Board, brings that subsection in conformity with section 10 (e) as amended.

House amendment no. 19, adding the phrase "and enforcing as so modified" to section 10 (h), was accepted by the conference agreement as conforming to the changes in the previous amendments.

The conference agreement accepted House amendments nos. 20, 21, and 22 as constituting merely formal corrections in the citations of the various statutes.

House amendment no. 23 inserted a new section providing that "Nothing in this act shall abridge the freedom of speech or of the press as guaranteed in the first amendment to the Constitution." The conference agreement rejected this amendment as having no proper place in the bill. There is no reason why the Congress should single out this provision of the Constitution for special affirmation. The amendment could not possibly have had any legal effect, because it was merely a restatement of the first amendment to the Constitution, which remains the law of the land, irrespective of congressional declaration.

House amendments nos. 24 and 25 merely renumbered the sections as made necessary by House amendment no. 23 inserting a new section. Since the conference agreement has stricken out House amendment no. 23, House amendments nos. 24 and 25 become unnecessary and are rejected by the conference agreement.

The conference agreement accepts the House amendment to the title of the bill, because it describes more accurately the jurisdictional basis for the bill.

WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.,
RICHARD J. WELCH,
GLENN GRISWOLD,
ROBERT RAMSPECK,
W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, there were two matters in this bill in which I was very much interested, one being the making of the Board an independent agency, without any connection with the executive department. That is retained in the bill. The other was an amendment limiting the authority of the Board to designate units appropriate for collective bargaining.

We have worked out a compromise with reference to that amendment which accomplishes, in my opinion, exactly the object I had in mind, which is to limit the jurisdiction of the Board in setting up units appropriate for collective bargaining, to plant units, craft units, or employer units, the employer unit being the largest unit constituted.

In this connection I want to pay tribute to the fairness and generosity of the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Labor [Mr. CONNERY]. [Applause.] I think this House ought to know that although he fought this amendment vigorously on the floor when it was being considered, after it was adopted he insisted and continued to insist that I have a fair opportunity to work out a compromise, and he not only did that but he helped me work it out. A great part of the credit is due to him for the success of this amendment, which I think is in keeping with the spirit of the act, which was to give free determination to the working people of this country. It is satisfactory to everybody involved, and I hope the report will be adopted without any question. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that under the language of the provision as suggested by the conference the craft unit can be as broad as the entire country?

Mr. RAMSPECK. There is some question about that, I will say to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does not that language destroy the beneficial effect of the amendment which the gentleman procured?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think so. The way "craft unit" is generally understood in the labor circles and in labor-union circles, it is such that I do not think it could be stretched to include varying classes of workers, as could have been done under the original language of the bill in the expression "other units." It might possibly take in such things as electrical workers in several different plants under a craft unit, but the Board certainly could not go out and take a group of factories—say, 5 factories in the gentleman's city, 4 of which were organized and 1 of which had declined to organize—and put them all into one unit and force in the employees of the fifth factory against their will.

Mr. TABER. They could, however, put in all of those who belonged to the same craft?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It is possible they might do that, although the Labor Board representative tells me that they do not think that they would do that.

Mr. TABER. Why should we permit them to do it when we all know it should not be done?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman has been in many conferences, many more than I have, and the gentleman knows he cannot always get all that he wants, but I am satisfied and I think we have accomplished the real purpose that I had in mind.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. I really believe that the compromise which the gentleman has worked out will more practically fit the situation to be met by the Labor Board than the original suggestion which the gentleman offered on the floor of the House. Take, for example, the coal miners, spread over a number of States, with the operators themselves organized and working in close harmony one with the other, it would be to the distinct disadvantage of labor if every mine was held as a distinct unit. The proposal which is brought in here will give the Labor Board certain administrative latitude that will enable all of the miners to enjoy a union that will cover the various fields and enable them to give proper and common consideration to their views. I think it is a very good suggestion.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I appreciate the gentleman's views about the matter.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. RICH. In the bill it sets up the fact that manufacturers may not do anything to coerce their employees to join a union. On the other hand, there is nothing in the bill that prohibits radical labor leaders or radical individuals from trying to have employees who are perfectly satisfied in a plant, being compelled to join a union that labor leaders would like to have them join. Why does not the bill contain something like that?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That matter is not involved in the conference. I do not agree with the gentleman, however, that they can be forced, under this bill, to join any union. There is nothing in the bill which will force anybody to join a union under any circumstances.

Mr. RICH. Then I should like to have the gentleman point that out to me in the bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Can the gentleman point out to me where there is anything to force them in?

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. TABER. There is a situation where the closed shop can be forced on them and they can be forced out of their jobs if they do join?

Mr. RAMSPECK. But that has to be agreed to by the employer?

Mr. TABER. Not by their individual employer but only the group.

Mr. RAMSPECK. It has to be agreed to by every employer.

Mr. TABER. Oh, no; not under this.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. In order to clarify the legislative situation with reference to Senate amendment no. 23, which reads:

Nothing in this act shall abridge the freedom of speech, or of the press, as guaranteed in the first amendment to the Constitution.

I call attention to the statement in the conference report:

The conference agreement rejected this amendment as having no proper place in the bill. There is no reason why the Congress should single out this provision of the Constitution for special affirmation. The amendment could not possibly have had any legal effect, because it was merely a restatement of the first amendment to the Constitution, which remains the law of the land irrespective of congressional declaration.

My understanding is that the legislative intent with reference to this measure insofar as the first amendment to the Constitution is concerned is carried out just as effectively by the amendment placed upon this bill in the House as though this amendment had not been stricken out in conference.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I agree with the gentleman absolutely that writing a provision of the Constitution into the bill could not add anything to it, and it ought not to be in the bill; but it is not the intention of this bill to violate any section of the Constitution.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I want to read the language of the so-called "compromise Ramspeck amendment." It reads as follows:

(b) The board shall decide in each case whether, in order to insure to employees the full benefit of their right to self-organization and to collective bargaining, and otherwise to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, or plant unit, or subdivision thereof.

Under this provision the board can fix the craft unit as wide as the country, or within particular bounds. There might be a unit in Boston, another in Cleveland, another in Philadelphia, and all three would be bound by the results of the deliberations of the majority.

I do not believe we ought to put the workingmen of this country in any such precarious position, and I do not think this language would at all protect them. I hope the conference report will not be agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 132, noes 45.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-two Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TABER and Mr. BACON asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the conference report was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendment to the title.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STILL FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A still further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2917. An act authorizing an appropriation to effect a settlement of the remainder due on Pershing Hall, a memorial already erected in Paris, France, to the commander in chief, officers, and men of the expeditionary forces, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7160) entitled "An act to provide for research into basic laws and principles relating to agriculture and to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work and the more complete endowment and support of land-grant colleges."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the conference report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PUBLIC UTILITY ACT OF 1935

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2796) to provide for the control and elimination of public-utility holding companies operating, or marketing securities, in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to regulate the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce, to amend the Federal Water Power Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2796, the Public Utility Act of 1935, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is a very important bill. The membership of the House does not know or understand it. I think it is a bill that ought to be read in its entirety so that every Member may know how to vote when the time for voting comes. Whenever the time comes that a majority member of the committee calls the bill reported out by his committee a "rattlesnake bill", I think it is time that we knew what the bill contained.

Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Public Utility Act of 1935."

TITLE I—CONTROL OF PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

NECESSITY FOR CONTROL OF HOLDING COMPANIES

SECTION 1. (a) Public-utility holding companies and their subsidiary companies are affected with a national public interest when, among other things, (1) their securities are widely marketed and distributed by means of the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce; (2) their service, sales, construction, and other contracts and arrangements are made and performed by means of the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce; (3) their subsidiary public-utility companies sell and transport gas and electric energy by the use of means and instrumentalities of interstate commerce; (4) their practices in respect of and control over subsidiary companies often materially affect the interstate commerce in which those companies engage; or (5) their activities extending over many States are not susceptible of effective control by any State and make difficult, if not impossible, effective State regulation of public-utility companies.

(b) The national public interest requires the exertion of Federal control over the transactions and practices of public-utility holding companies and their subsidiary companies and affiliates, where such companies or subsidiaries or affiliates operate, market securities, and transact business in interstate commerce or through the mails, because, as disclosed by the reports of the Federal Trade Commission made pursuant to Senate Resolution 83 (70th Cong., 1st sess.), the reports of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, made pursuant to House Resolution 56 (72d Cong., 1st sess.) and House Joint Resolution 572 (72d Cong., 2d sess.), and as otherwise disclosed, (1) the securities of such public-utility holding companies, subsidiary companies, and affiliates are sold to a large number of investors in different States; (2) such investors cannot obtain the information necessary to appraise the financial position or earning power of such issuers because of the absence of uniform standard accounts; (3) such securities are frequently issued without the approval or consent of the States having jurisdiction over subsidiary public-utility companies; (4) such securities are often issued upon the basis of fictitious asset values and of paper profits from intercompany transactions and hence do not accurately reflect the sums invested in underlying public-utility properties; (5) such securities are often issued in anticipation of excessive revenues from subsidiaries which if realized would burden consumers, and the failure to realize such revenues, because of State regulation of subsidiary public-utility companies, results in loss to investors who have been led to believe that such revenues are a legitimate part of the issuer's income; (6) such securities, when improvidently issued, subject subsidiary public-utility companies to the burden of supporting an overcapitalized superstructure, to the detriment of investors and consumers, and tend to prevent voluntary rate reductions which over a period of time might promote a greater and more economic use of gas and electric energy and thereby strengthen subsidiary public-utility companies; (7) subsidiary public-utility companies are often subjected to excessive charges for services, construction work, equipment, and materials to the detriment of investors and consumers; (8) subsidiary public-utility companies often enter into transactions with affiliates in which the absence of arm's length bargaining operates to the detriment of investors and consumers; (9) control of subsidiary public-utility companies throughout the United States has often been used to secure to holding companies, their affiliates, and subsidiary construction companies construction work for public-utility companies in restraint of free and independent competition in that field; (10) service, management, construction, and other contracts involve the allocation of charges among subsidiary public-utility companies in different States and present problems of regulation which cannot be dealt with effectively by the States; (11) control of subsidiary public-utility companies materially affects the accounting practices and rate, dividend, and other policies of such companies, thereby in many instances complicating and obstructing State regulation of such subsidiary companies; (12) the growth and extension of holding companies in some cases have borne no relation to the economies of management and operation or to the integration and coordination of related properties, but have been influenced by a desire for economic power and security profits and have tended toward the concentration and monopolization in a few holding-company systems of control of gas and electric utility companies to the detriment of investors, consumers, and the general public; (13) the abuses above enumerated, commonly associated with the activities of many public-utility holding companies, have been so persistent and so wide-spread that they necessitate legislation to control the holding company and eliminate it as an artificial corporate device inherently injurious to investors, consumers, and the general public, except where it is useful and necessary for the operations of a geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

(c) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this title, in accordance with which policy all the provisions of this title shall be interpreted, to meet the problems and eliminate the evils as enumerated in this section, connected with the public-utility holding companies which are engaged in interstate commerce or in activities which directly affect or burden interstate commerce; and for the purpose of effectuating such policy to compel the simplification of public-utility holding-company systems and the elimination therefrom of properties not economically and geographically related in operations, and to provide at the end of 5 years for the elimination of the public-utility holding company except as otherwise expressly provided in this title.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. (a) When used in this title, unless the context otherwise requires—

(1) "Person" means an individual or company.

(2) "Company" means a corporation, a partnership, an association, a joint-stock company, a business trust, an organized group of persons, whether incorporated or not, or any receiver, trustee, or other liquidating agent of any of the foregoing.

(3) "Electric utility company" means any company which owns or operates facilities for the generation, transmission, or distribution of electric energy for sale or which transmits, sells, distributes, or furnishes electric energy for a charge; but does not mean a company which sells or distributes electric energy solely for the use of its tenants and not for resale: Provided, however, That the term "electric utility company" shall not be held to include any company operating within a single State and which sells or otherwise furnishes 75 percent or more of the electric energy which it generates to another company directly or indirectly controlling the generating company, if such controlling company uses and does not resell such electric energy, and if, also, such controlling company is engaged primarily in manufacturing, other than the manufacturing of gas or electric energy, and is not controlled by any other company.

(4) "Gas utility company" means any company which owns or operates facilities for the production, transportation, or distribution of natural or manufactured gas, and which transports, distributes, sells, or furnishes such gas for light, heat, or power for a charge; but does not mean a company whose gas business is confined solely to the production, transportation, sale, or distribution of gas in enclosed portable containers.

(5) "Public-utility company" means an electric utility company or a gas utility company.

(6) "Commission" means the Securities and Exchange Commission.

(7) "Holding company" means—

(A) Any company which, either alone or in conjunction and pursuant to an arrangement or understanding with one or more other persons, directly or indirectly owns, holds, or controls 10 percent or more of the outstanding voting securities of a public-utility company or of a company which is a holding company by virtue of this clause or clause (B), unless the Commission, as hereinafter provided, by order declares such company not to be a holding company; and

(B) Any person or persons which the Commission determines, after notice and opportunity for hearing, directly or indirectly to exercise such a controlling influence over the management or policies of any public-utility or holding company as to make it necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers that such person or persons be subject to the obligations, duties, and liabilities imposed in this title upon holding companies.

The Commission, upon application, shall by order declare that a company is not a holding company under clause (A) if the Commission finds that the applicant (i) does not, either alone or in conjunction and pursuant to an arrangement or understanding with one or more other persons, directly or indirectly control a public utility or holding company either through one or more intermediary persons or by any means or device whatsoever, (ii) is not an intermediary company through which such control is exercised, and (iii) does not, directly or indirectly, exercise such a controlling influence over the management or policies of any public utility or holding company as to make it necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers that such company be subject to the obligations, duties, and liabilities imposed in this title upon holding companies. The filing of an application hereunder in good faith by a company other than a registered holding company shall exempt the applicant from any obligation, duty, or liability imposed in this title upon the applicant as a holding company, until the Commission has acted upon such application. As a condition to the entry of any such order and as a part of the terms of any such order, the Commission may require the applicant to apply periodically for a renewal of such order and to do or refrain from doing such acts or things, in respect of exercise of voting rights, control over proxies, designation of officers and directors, existence of interlocking officers, directors, and other relationships, and submission of periodic or special reports regarding affiliations or intercorporate relationships of the applicant, as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate to insure that the applicant during the period for which such order is effective continues to be entitled to the benefits of the findings upon which such order is based. The Commission, upon its own motion or upon application by the company determined not to be a holding company, may, after notice and opportunity for hearing, revoke, modify, or confirm any such order whenever in its judgment the circumstances warrant such revocation, modification, or confirmation.

(8) "Subsidiary company" of a holding company means—

(A) Any company 10 percent or more of the outstanding voting securities of which are directly or indirectly owned, held, or controlled by such holding company (or by a company that is a subsidiary company of such holding company by virtue of this clause or clause (B)) either alone or in conjunction and pursuant to an arrangement or understanding with one or more other persons, unless the Commission, as hereinafter provided, by order declares such company not to be a subsidiary company; and

(B) Any person the management or policies of which the Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing, determines to be subject to a controlling influence, directly or indirectly, by a holding company or companies so as to make it necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers that such person be subject to the obligations, duties, and liabilities imposed in this title upon subsidiary companies of holding companies.

The Commission, upon application, shall by order declare that a company is not a subsidiary company under clause (A) if the Commission finds that (i) such company is not controlled, directly or indirectly, by a holding company, either alone or in conjunction and pursuant to an arrangement or understanding with one or more other persons, or through one or more intermediary persons or by any means or device whatsoever, (ii) such company is not an intermediary company through which such control of another company is exercised, and (iii) the management or policies of such company are not subject to a controlling influence, directly or indirectly, by any holding company or companies so as to make it necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers that such company be subject to the obligations, duties, and liabilities imposed in this title upon subsidiary companies of holding companies. The filing of an application hereunder in good faith shall exempt such company from any obligation, duty, or liability imposed in this title upon such company as a subsidiary company of a holding company until the Commission has acted upon such application. As a condition to the entry, and as a part of the terms, of any such order, the Commission may require application to be made periodically for a renewal of such order and may require the filing of such periodic or special reports regarding the affiliations or intercorporate relationships of such company as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate to enable it to revoke or modify the order if such company does not continue to be entitled to the benefits of the findings upon which such order is based. The Commission, upon its own motion or upon application, may, after notice and opportunity for hearing, revoke, modify, or confirm any such order whenever in its judgment the circumstances warrant such revocation, modification, or confirmation.

(9) "Holding company system" means any holding company, together with all its subsidiary companies, and all mutual service companies (as defined in paragraph (13) of this subsection) of which such holding company or any subsidiary company thereof is a member company (as defined in paragraph (14) of this subsection).

(10) "Associate company" of a company means any company in the same holding company system with such company.

(11) "Affiliate" of a specified company means—

(B) Any person that owns, holds, or controls, directly or indirectly, 5 percent or more of the outstanding voting securities of any company which is an affiliate of such specified company under clause (A) of this paragraph or which becomes an affiliate thereof by virtue of this clause;

(C) Any company 5 percent or more of whose outstanding voting securities are owned, held, or controlled, directly or indirectly, by such specified company or by any person that is an affiliate of such specified company under clause (A) or (B) of this paragraph;

(D) Any individual who is an officer or director of such specified company or of any company which is an affiliate thereof under clause (A) or (B) of this paragraph;

(E) Any company which has one or more officers or directors in common with such specified company; and

(F) Any person that the Commission determines, after notice and opportunity for hearing, to stand in such relation to such specified company that there is an absence of arm's length bargaining in transactions between them so as to make it necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers that such person be subject to the obligations, duties, and liabilities imposed in this title upon affiliates of a company.

assumption of liability on, or warrant or right to subscribe to or purchase, any of the foregoing.

(17) "Voting security" means any security presently entitling the owner or holder thereof to vote in the direction or management of the affairs of a company, or any security issued under or pursuant to any trust, agreement, or arrangement whereby a trustee or trustees or agent or agents for the owner or holder of such security are presently entitled to vote in the direction or management of the affairs of a company; and a specified percent of the outstanding voting securities of a company means such amount of the outstanding voting securities of such company as entitles the holder or holders thereof to cast said specified percent of the aggregate votes which the holders of all the outstanding voting securities of such company are entitled to cast in the direction or management of the affairs of such company.

(18) "Capital assets" means the facilities, in place, of any electric utility company or gas utility company for the production, transmission, transportation, or distribution of electric energy or natural or manufactured gas.

(19) "Service contract" means any contract, agreement, or understanding whereby a person undertakes to sell or furnish, for a charge, any managerial, financial, legal, engineering, purchasing, marketing, auditing, statistical, advertising, publicity, tax, research, or any other service, information, or data.

(26) "State commission" means any commission, board, agency, or officer, by whatever name designated, of a State, municipality, or other political subdivision of a State which under the laws of such State has jurisdiction to regulate public-utility companies.

(27) "State securities commission" means any commission, board, agency, or officer, by whatever name designated, other than a State commission as defined in paragraph (26) of this subsection, which under the laws of a State has jurisdiction to regulate, approve, or control the issue or sale of a security by a company.

(28) "Interstate commerce" means trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or between any State and any place outside thereof.

(b) No person shall be deemed to be a holding company under clause (B) of paragraph (7) of subsection (a), or a subsidiary company under clause (B) of paragraph (8) of such subsection, or an affiliate under clause (F) of paragraph (11) of such subsection, unless the Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing, has issued an order declaring such person to be a holding company, subsidiary company, or an affiliate. Such an order shall not become effective for at least 30 days after the mailing of a copy thereof to the person thereby declared to be a holding company, subsidiary company, or affiliate. The Commission, on its own motion or upon application by the person declared to be a holding company, subsidiary company, or affiliate, may, after notice and opportunity for hearing, revoke, suspend, modify, or confirm any such order whenever in its judgment the circumstances warrant such revocation, suspension, modification, or confirmation.

POWER TO MAKE PARTICULAR EXEMPTIONS REGARDING HOLDING COMPANIES, SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES, AND AFFILIATES

SEC. 3. (a) The Commission, by rules and regulations upon its own motion or by order upon application, shall exempt any holding company, and every subsidiary company thereof as such, from any provision or provisions of this title except insofar as the Commission finds the exemption from any provision affecting the sale or distribution of securities by any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce detrimental to the protection of investors, if—

(1) such holding company, and every subsidiary company thereof which is a public-utility company from which it derives any material part of its income, are predominantly intrastate in character and carry on their business substantially in a single State in which such holding company and every such subsidiary company thereof are organized;

(2) such holding company is predominantly a public-utility company operating as such in one or more contiguous States, in one of which it is organized;

(3) such holding company is only incidentally interested in a public-utility company, being primarily engaged or interested in one or more businesses other than the business of a public-utility company and not deriving, directly or indirectly, any material part of its income from any one or more subsidiary companies, the principal business of which is that of a public-utility company;

(4) such holding company is temporarily a holding company solely by reason of the acquisition of securities for purposes of liquidation or distribution in connection with a bona fide debt previously contracted or in connection with a bona fide arrangement for the underwriting or distribution of securities; or

(5) such holding company is not, and no subsidiary company thereof from which it derives any material part of its income is, a company the principal business of which within the United States is that of a public-utility company.

Within a reasonable time after the receipt of any application for exemption under this subsection, the Commission shall enter an order granting, or, after notice and opportunity for hearing, denying or otherwise disposing of, such application. The filing of any such application in good faith by a person other than a registered holding company shall exempt the applicant from any obligation, duty, or liability imposed in this title upon the applicant as a holding company, until the Commission has acted upon such application. The Commission, upon its own motion or upon application by the holding company, or any subsidiary company thereof, exempted by any order issued hereunder, shall, after notice and opportunity for hearing, revoke, modify, or confirm any such order whenever in its judgment the circumstances warrant such revocation, modification, or confirmation.

(b) The Commission may, by rules and regulations, conditionally or unconditionally exempt any specified class or classes of persons from the obligations, duties, or liabilities imposed upon such persons as subsidiary companies or affiliates or public-utility companies under any provision or provisions of this title, and may provide within the extent of any such exemption that such specified class or classes of persons shall not be deemed subsidiary companies or affiliates or public-utility companies within the meaning of any such provision or provisions, if and to the extent that it deems the exemption necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers and not contrary to the purposes of this title: Provided, however, That the Commission shall not exempt under this subsection any class of persons as public-utility companies unless the persons included in such class are only incidentally public-utility companies, and are primarily engaged in one or more businesses other than that of a public-utility company.

TRANSACTIONS BY UNREGISTERED HOLDING COMPANIES

SEC. 4. (a) After October 1, 1935, unless a holding company is registered under section 5, it shall be unlawful for such holding company, directly or indirectly—

(1) to sell, transport, transmit, or distribute, or own or operate any capital assets for the transportation, transmission, or distribution of, natural or manufactured gas or electric energy in interstate commerce;

(2) by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, to negotiate, enter into, or take any step in the performance of, any service, sales, or construction contract undertaking to perform services or construction work for, or sell goods to, any public-utility company or holding company;

(3) to distribute, or make any public offering for sale or exchange of, any security of such holding company, any subsidiary company or affiliate of such holding company, any public-utility company, or any holding company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or to sell any such security having reason to believe that such security, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, will be distributed or made the subject of a public offering;

(4) by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, to acquire or negotiate for the acquisition of any security or capital assets of any subsidiary company or affiliate of such holding company, any public-utility company, or any holding company;

(5) to engage in any business in interstate commerce; or

(6) to own, hold, or control any security of any subsidiary company thereof that does any of the acts enumerated in paragraphs (1) to (5), inclusive, of this subsection.

(b) Every holding company which has outstanding any security any of which, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, has been distributed or made the subject of a public offering subsequent to January 1, 1925, and any of which security is owned or held on September 1, 1935 (or, if such company is not a holding company on that date, on the date such company becomes a holding company) by persons not resident in the State in which such holding company is organized, shall register under section 5 on or before October 1, 1935, or the thirtieth day after such company becomes a holding company, whichever date is later.

REGISTRATION OF HOLDING COMPANIES

SEC. 5. (a) On or at any time after September 1, 1935, any holding company or any person purposing to become a holding company may register by filing with the Commission a notification of registration, in such form as the Commission may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. A person shall be deemed to be registered upon receipt by the Commission of such notification of registration.

(b) It shall be the duty of every registered holding company to file with the Commission, within such reasonable time after registration as the Commission shall fix by rules and regulations or order, a registration statement in such form as the Commission shall by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. Such registration statement shall include—

(1) such copies of the charter or articles of incorporation, partnership, or agreement, with all amendments thereto, and the by-laws, trust indentures, mortgages, underwriting arrangements, voting-trust agreements, and similar documents by whatever name known, of or relating to the registrant or any of its associate companies as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers;

(2) such information in such form and in such detail relating to, and copies of such documents of or relating to, the registrant and its associate companies as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers in respect of—

(A) the organization and financial structure of such companies and the nature of their business;

(B) the terms, position, rights, and privileges of the different classes of their securities outstanding;

(C) the terms and underwriting arrangements under which their securities, during not more than the 5 preceding years, have been offered to the public or otherwise disposed of and the relations of underwriters to, and their interest in, such companies;

(D) the directors and officers of such companies, their remuneration, their interest in the securities of, their material contracts with, and their borrowings from, any of such companies;

(E) the names of all security holders of record (or otherwise known to the registrant) owning, holding, or controlling 1 percent or more of any class of security of any such companies, and their interest in the securities of, relations to, and material contracts with, any of such companies;

(F) the remuneration exceeding $10,000 per annum to persons other than directors and officers;

(G) bonus and profit-sharing arrangements;

(H) material contracts, not made in the ordinary course of business, and service, sales, and construction contracts;

(I) options in respect of securities;

(J) balance sheets for not more than the 5 preceding fiscal years, certified, if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission, by an independent public accountant;

(K) profit and loss statements for not more than the 5 preceding fiscal years, certified, if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission, by an independent public accountant;

(3) such further information or documents regarding the registrant or its associate companies or the relations between them as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest, or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(c) If in the judgment of the Commission any information required under subsection (b) is inapplicable to any specified class or classes of registrants, the Commission shall require in lieu thereof the submission of such other information of comparable character as it may find applicable to such class or classes of registrants.

(d) The Commission by such rules and regulations or order as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, may permit a registrant to file a preliminary registration statement without complying with the provisions of subsection (b); but every registrant shall file a complete registration statement with the Commission within such reasonable period of time as the Commission shall fix by rules and regulations or order, but not later than 1 year after the date of registration.

(e) A registered holding company which has ceased to be a holding company may upon application withdraw its registration in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Commission and upon such terms and conditions as the Commission may find necessary for the protection of investors.

UNLAWFUL SECURITY TRANSACTIONS BY REGISTERED HOLDING AND SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES

SEC. 6. (a) Except in accordance with a declaration effective under section 7 and with the order under such section permitting such declaration to become effective, it shall be unlawful for any registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, directly or indirectly (1) to issue or sell any security of such company; or (2) to exercise any privilege or right to alter the priorities, preferences, voting power, or other rights of the holders of an outstanding security of such company.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply to the issue, renewal, or guaranty by a registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof of a note or draft (including the pledge of any security as collateral therefor) if such note or draft (1) is not part of a public offering, (2) matures or is renewed for not more than 9 months, exclusive of days of grace, after the date of such issue, renewal, or guaranty thereof, and (3) aggregates (together with all other then outstanding notes and drafts of a maturity of 9 months or less, exclusive of days of grace, as to which such company is primarily or secondarily liable) not more than 5 percent of the principal amount and par value of the other securities of such company then outstanding, or such greater percent thereof as the Commission upon application may by order authorize as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. In the case of securities having no principal amount or no par value, the value for the purpose of this subsection shall be the fair market value as to the date of issue. The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply to the issue, by a registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, of a security issued pursuant to the terms of any security outstanding on January 1, 1935, giving the holder of such outstanding security the right to convert such outstanding security into another security of the same issuer or of another person, or giving the rights to subscribe to another security of the same issuer or another issuer. Within 10 days after any such issue, renewal, or guaranty, such holding company or subsidiary company thereof shall file with the Commission a certificate of notification in such form and setting forth such of the information required in a declaration under section 7 as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to sell or offer for sale, from house to house, any security of such registered holding company. The term "house" shall not include an office used for business purposes.

DECLARATIONS BY REGISTERED HOLDING AND SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES IN RESPECT OF SECURITY TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 7. (a) A registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof may file a declaration with the Commission, regarding any of the acts enumerated in subsection (a) of section 6 in such form as the Commission may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. Such declaration shall include—

(1) such of the information and documents which are required to be filed in order to register a security under section 7 of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers; and

(2) such additional information, in such form and detail, and such documents regarding the declarant or any associate company thereof, the particular security and compliance with the applicable State laws as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(b) A declaration filed under this section shall become effective within such reasonable period of time after the filing thereof as the Commission shall fix by rules and regulations or order, unless the Commission prior to the expiration of such period shall have issued an order to the declarant to show cause why such declaration should become effective. Within a reasonable time after an opportunity for hearing upon an order to show cause under this subsection, unless the declarant shall withdraw its declaration the Commission shall enter an order either permitting such declaration to become effective as filed or amended, or refusing to permit such declaration to become effective. Amendments to a declaration may be made upon such terms and conditions as the Commission may prescribe.

(c) The Commission shall not permit a declaration regarding the issue or sale of a security to become effective unless, in its judgment—

(1) such security is (A) a common stock having a par value and being without preference as to dividends or distribution over, and having at least equal voting rights with, any outstanding security of the declarant; (B) a bond secured by a first lien on physical property of the declarant or by an obligation of a subsidiary company of the declarant secured by a first lien on physical property of such subsidiary company; (C) a guaranty of, or assumption of liability on, a security of another company; or (D) a receiver's or trustee's certificate duly authorized by the appropriate court or courts; or

(2) such security is to be issued or sold solely (A) for the purpose of refunding, extending, exchanging, or discharging an outstanding security of the declarant and/or a predecessor company thereof or for the purpose of effecting a merger, consolidation, or other reorganization; (B) for the purpose of financing the business of the declarant as a public utility company; (C) for the purpose of financing the business of the declarant, when the declarant is neither a holding company nor a public utility company; and/or (D) for necessary and urgent corporate purposes of the declarant where the requirements of the provisions of paragraph (1) would impose an unreasonable financial burden upon the declarant and are not necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(d) If the requirements of subsections (c), (g), and (h) are satisfied, the Commission shall permit a declaration regarding the issue or sale of a security to become effective unless, in the judgment of the Commission, (1) the security is not reasonably adapted to the security structure of the declarant and other companies in the same holding-company system; (2) the security does not bear a proper relation to the sums prudently invested in the property of the declarant and its subsidiary companies; (3) financing by the issue and sale of the particular security is not necessary or appropriate to the economical and efficient operation of a business in which the applicant lawfully is engaged or has an interest; (4) the fees, commissions, or other remuneration, to whomsoever paid, directly or indirectly, in connection with the issue, sale, or distribution of the security are not reasonable; (5) in the case of a security that is a guaranty of, or assumption of liability on, a security of another company, the circumstances are such as to constitute the making of such guaranty or the assumption of such liability an improper risk for the declarant; or (6) the terms and conditions of the issue or sale of such security are detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers.

(e) If the requirements of subsections (g) and (h) are satisfied, the Commission shall permit a declaration to become effective regarding the exercise of a privilege or right to alter the priorities, preferences, voting power, or other rights of the holders of an outstanding security unless, in the judgment of the Commission, such exercise of such privilege will result in an unfair or inequitable distribution of voting power among holders of the securities of the declarant or is otherwise detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers.

(f) Any order permitting a declaration to become effective may contain such terms and conditions as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. Such terms and conditions, among other things, may require the granting of a preemptive right to security holders irrespective of a previous waiver of such right; may prohibit the giving of options or prescribe the limits within which they may be given; and may condition the issue or sale of a security upon the elimination of such financial practices as the Commission may find detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers and upon such requirements as to competititve bidding as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(g) The Commission shall not permit a declaration to become effective regarding any security which is subject, under the laws of any State, to the jurisdiction of a State commission or a State securities commission unless the applicant shows that the applicable State laws have been complied with.

(h) The Commission shall not permit to become effective a declaration filed on or after April 1, 1936, by any registered holding company unless such company has been a registered holding company during the 6 months immediately preceding the filing of such declaration, or unless such company became a registered holding company not later than the thirtieth day after it became a holding company.

RESTRICTION ON BUSINESS OF HOLDING COMPANIES

SEC. 8. (a) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company, or any subsidiary company thereof, to acquire any interest, directly or indirectly, through the ownership or control of securities or otherwise, in any business other than—

(1) the business of a public utility company as such;

(2) subject to such terms and conditions, as the Commission, by rules and regulations or order, finds necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent acquisitions detrimental to the carrying out of any provision of section 11, any business, in which such company (or any company with which such company is merged or consolidated) lawfully is engaged or has an interest, or which is reasonably incidental or necessary or appropriate to the economic and efficient conduct of such a business.

This subsection shall not apply to the acquisition of securities specified in subsection (c) of section 9.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company, or any subsidiary company thereof, to acquire any interest, directly or indirectly, through the ownership or control of securities, or otherwise, in any facilities for the transportation of natural gas in interstate commerce or for the production of natural gas, unless upon application the Commission finds that the primary purpose of such acquisition is to serve the requirements of such registered holding company or subsidiary companies thereof as gas utility or electric utility companies.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company which, or any subsidiary company of which, is a public utility company operating in the United States to acquire any interest, directly or indirectly, through the ownership or control of securities, or otherwise, in any public utility company operating outside of the United States: Provided, however, That upon application the Commission may by order exempt any such registered holding company from the provisions of this subsection, upon such terms and conditions as it may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, in respect of a public-utility company or companies operating outside of the United States, if it finds that the operations of such public-utility company or companies are, or may be, economically and geographically integrated with the public-utility system of such registered holding company.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company, or any subsidiary company thereof, to acquire any interest, directly or indirectly, through the ownership or control of securities, or otherwise, in an electric utility company and a gas utility company serving substantially the same territory whenever the applicable State law prohibits, or requires approval or authorization of, the ownership or operation of the capital assets of such electric and gas utility companies by a single company, unless the State commission of such State has expressly approved such company's acquiring such interest.

(e) Subject to such limitations as the Commission by rules and regulations or order finds necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent acquisitions detrimental to the carrying out of any provision of section 11, subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section shall not apply to the acquisition by a registered holding company or a subsidiary company thereof of securities of a company in which such registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof already has an interest.

ACQUISITION OF SECURITIES AND CAPITAL ASSETS

SEC. 9. (a) Unless the acquisition has been approved by the Commission under section 10, it shall be unlawful—

(1) For any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means of instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to acquire, directly or indirectly, any securities or capital assets of another company;

(2) For any person who is an affiliate, under clause (A) or (B) of paragraph (11) of subsection (a) of section 2, of any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to acquire, directly or indirectly, any securities or capital assets of such company of which it is an affiliate; or

(3) For any person, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, to acquire, directly, or indirectly, any security of any public-utility company, if such person is an affiliate, under clause (A) or (B) of paragraph (11) of subsection (a) of section 2, of such company, or will by virtue of such acquisition become such an affiliate.

(b) Subsection (a) shall not apply to—

(1) The acquisition by a public-utility company of capital assets the acquisition of which has been expressly authorized by a State commission; or

(2) The acquisition by a public-utility company of securities of a subsidiary public-utility company thereof, provided that both such public-utility companies and all other public-utility companies in the same holding-company system are organized in the same State, that the business of each such company in such system is substantially confined to such State, and that the acquisition of such securities has been expressly authorized by the State commission of such State.

(c) Subsection (a) shall not apply to the acquisition by a registered holding company, or a subsidiary company thereof, of—

(1) Securities of, or securities the principal or interest of which is guaranteed by the United States, a State, or political subdivision of a State or any agency, authority, or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, or any corporation which is wholly owned, directly or indirectly, by any one or more of the foregoing;

(2) such other readily marketable securities, within the limitation of such amounts, as the Commission may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate for investment of current funds and as not detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers; or

(3) such commercial paper and other securities, within such limitations, as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the ordinary course of business of a registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof and as not detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers.

APPROVAL OF ACQUISITION OF SECURITIES AND CAPITAL ASSETS

SEC. 10. (a) A person may apply for approval of the acquisition of securities or capital assets, by filing an application in such form as the Commission may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors and consumers. Such application shall include—

(1) In the case of the acquisition of securities, such information and copies of such documents as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers in respect of—

(A) the security to be acquired, the consideration to be paid therefor, and compliance with the applicable State laws in respect of the issue, sale, or acquisition thereof,

(B) the outstanding securities of the company whose security is to be acquired, the terms, position, rights, and privileges of each class and the options in respect of any such securities,

(C) the names of all security holders of record (or otherwise known to the applicant) owning, holding, or controlling 1 percent or more of any class of security of such company, the officers and directors of such company, and their remuneration, security holding in, material contracts with, and borrowings from such company and the offices or directorships held, and securities owned, held, or controlled, by them in other companies,

(D) the bonus, profit-sharing and voting-trust agreements, underwriting arrangements, trust indentures, mortgages, and similar documents, by whatever name known, of or relating to such company,

(E) the material contracts, not made in the ordinary course of business, and the service, sales, and construction contracts of such company,

(F) the securities owned, held, or controlled, directly or indirectly, by such company,

(G) balance sheets and profit-and-loss statements of such company for not more than the 5 preceding fiscal years, certified, if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission by an independent public accountant,

(H) any further information regarding such company and any associate company or affiliate thereof, or its relations with the applicant company, and

(I) if the applicant be not a registered holding company, any of the information and documents which may be required under section 5 from a registered holding company;

(2) in the case of the acquisition of capital assets, such information concerning such assets, the value thereof and consideration to be paid therefor, the owner or owners thereof and their relation to, agreements with, and interest in the securities of, the applicant or any associate company thereof as the Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(b) If the requirements of subsection (f) are satisfied, the Commission shall approve the acquisition of securities or capital assets unless, in the judgment of the Commission—

(1) such acquisition will tend toward interlocking relations or the concentration of control of public-utility companies, of a kind or to an extent detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers;

(2) the consideration, including all fees, commissions, and other remuneration, to whomsoever paid, to be given, directly or indirectly, in connection with such acquisition is not reasonable or does not bear a proper relation to the sums prudently invested in the capital assets to be acquired or the capital assets underlying the securities to be acquired; or

(3) such acquisition will unduly complicate the capital structure of the holding-company system of the applicant or will be detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers.

The Commission may condition its approval of the acquisition of securities of another company upon such a fair offer to purchase such of the other securities of the company whose security is to be acquired as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b), the Commission shall not approve—

(1) An acquisition of security or capital assets which is unlawful under the provisions of section 8; or

(2) The acquisition of securities or capital assets of a public utility or holding company unless (A) in the judgment of the Commission such acquisition will serve the public interest by simplifying the corporate structure of the holding-company system of which the applicant is a part; or (B) the applicant has obtained from the Federal Power Commission a certificate that such acquisition will serve the public interest by tending toward the economical and efficient development of a geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

(d) Within such reasonable time after the filing of an application under this section as the Commission shall fix by rules and regulations or order, the Commission shall enter an order either granting or, after notice and opportunity for hearing, denying approval of the acquisition unless the applicant shall withdraw its application. Amendments to an application may be made upon such terms and conditions as the Commission may prescribe.

(e) The Commission, in any order approving the acquisition of securities or capital assets, may prescribe such terms and conditions in respect of such acquisition, including the price to be paid for such securities or capital assets, as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(f) The Commission shall not approve the acquisition of securities or capital assets the acquisition, issue, or sale of which is subject, under the laws of any State, to the jurisdiction of a State commission or State securities commission unless the applicant shows that the applicable State laws have been complied with.

SIMPLIFICATION OF HOLDING-COMPANY STRUCTURES; REORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 11. (a) It shall be the duty of the Commission to examine the corporate structure of every registered holding company and subsidiary company thereof, the relationships among the companies in the holding-company system of every such company and the character of the interests thereof and the properties owned or controlled thereby to determine the extent to which the corporate structure of such holding-company system and the companies therein may be simplified, unnecessary complexities therein eliminated, voting power fairly and equitably distributed among the holders of securities thereof, and the properties and business thereof confined to those necessary or appropriate to the operations of a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

(b) It shall be the duty of the Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing—

(1) After January 1, 1938, to require each registered holding company and each subsidiary company thereof to divest itself of any interest in or control over property or persons to the extent that the Commission finds necessary or appropriate to limit the operations of the holding-company system of which such company is a part to a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system and such business as is reasonably incidental, or economically necessary or appropriate, to the operations of such system; the Commission may permit as reasonably incidental or economically necessary or appropriate to the operations of such system the retention of an interest in any business (other than the business of a public-utility company as such) in which such registered holding company or such subsidiary company thereof is engaged or has an interest if the Commission finds (1) that such business is affected with a public interest and its rates or charges are regulated by law, and that the retention of such interest in such business is not detrimental to the proper functioning of a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system, or (2) that such business is solely that of owning and operating farm lands for agricultural or horticultural purposes and is carrying on experimental or developmental work in agriculture or horticulture, in connection with any State or any political subdivision, or educational institution of such State, for the improvement of agriculture or horticulture in such State;

(2) After January 1, 1938, to require each registered holding company, and each subsidiary company thereof, to be reorganized or dissolved whenever the Commission finds that the corporate structure or continued existence of such company unduly or unnecessarily complicates the structure of the holding-company system of which it is a part, or unfairly or inequitably distributes voting power among the holders of securities, or is detrimental to the proper functioning of a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system; and

(3) Promptly after January 1, 1940, to require each registered holding company to take such steps (either by divesting itself of control, securities, or other assets, or by reorganization or dissolution, or otherwise) as the Commission finds necessary or appropriate to make such company cease to be a holding company: Provided, however, That the Commission, upon such terms and conditions as it may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, shall permit a registered holding company to continue to be a holding company in the first degree if such company has obtained from the Federal Power Commission a certificate that the continuance of the holding-company relation is necessary, under the applicable State or foreign law, for the operations of a geographically and economically integrated public-utility system serving an economic region in a single State or extending into two or more contiguous States or into a contiguous foreign country.

(c) In any order under subsection (b), the Commission shall fix the time within which such order shall be complied with, not later than 1 year from the date of such order; but the Commission shall, upon a showing that the applicant has been or will be unable in the exercise of due diligence to comply with such order within the time fixed, extend such time for an additional period not exceeding 1 year if it finds such extension necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(d) The Commission may apply to a court, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (f) of section 18, to enforce compliance with any order under this section. Upon any such application, the court as a court of equity shall take exclusive jurisdiction and possession, for the purposes of this title, of such assets of the company or companies, wherever located, as may be the subject of such order, or, in the case of any order for reorganization or dissolution, exclusive jurisdiction and possession, for the purposes of this title, of the company or companies and all the assets thereof, wherever located; and the court shall have jurisdiction to appoint a trustee, and the court may constitute and appoint the Commission as sole trustee, to administer under the direction of the courts the assets so possessed and the proceeds thereof as a trust estate for the benefit of the persons interested therein as their interests may appear, and in any such proceeding the court shall not appoint any other person other than the Commission as trustee or receiver without notifying the Commission or giving it an opportunity to be heard before making any such appointment. In any proceeding for the enforcement of an order of the Commission under this section, the trustee with the approval of the court shall have power to dispose of any or all of such assets and, subject to such terms and conditions as the court may prescribe, may make such disposition in accordance with a fair and equitable reorganization plan which shall have been approved by the Commission after opportunity for hearing. Such reorganization plan may be proposed in the first instance by the Commission, or, subject to such rules and regulations as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, by any person having a bona fide interest (as defined by the rules and regulations of the Commission) in the reorganization.

(e) In accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, any registered holding company or any subsidiary company of a registered holding company may, at any time after January 1, 1936, submit a plan to the Commission for the divestment of control, securities, or other assets, or for the reorganization or dissolution, of such company or any subsidiary company thereof for the purpose of enabling such company or any subsidiary company thereof to comply with the provisions of this title and the rules, regulations, and orders thereunder or to make unnecessary the issuance of any order by the Commission in respect of any such company under subsection (b). If, after notice and opportunity for hearing, the Commission shall approve such plan, as submitted or as modified to meet such terms and conditions as the Commission may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, as fair and equitable to the persons affected by such plan and as appropriate to effectuate the provisions of this title and the rules, regulations, and orders thereunder, the Commission shall make an order authorizing and directing such company or any subsidiary company thereof to divest itself of control, securities, or other assets or to be reorganized or dissolved in accordance with such plan; and the Commission may apply to a court, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (f) of section 18, to enforce compliance with such order. If, upon any such application, the court, after notice and opportunity for hearing, shall approve such plan as fair and equitable and as appropriate to effectuate the provisions of this title and the rules, regulations, and orders thereunder, the court shall take exclusive jurisdiction and possession, for the purposes of this title, of such assets of the company or companies, wherever located, as may be the subject of such order, or, in the case of any order for reorganization or dissolution, exclusive jurisdiction and possession, for the purposes of this title, of the company or companies and all the assets thereof, wherever located; and the court shall have jurisdiction to appoint a trustee, and the court may constitute and appoint the Commission as sole trustee, to administer, under the direction of the court and in accordance with the plan theretofore approved by the court and the Commission, the assets so possessed and the proceeds thereof as a trust estate for the benefit of the persons interested therein as their interests may appear. It shall be within the authority of the court and the Commission to approve and carry out any plan under this subsection which it would be within their respective authority to approve and carry out under subsection (d) of this section.

(f) In any proceeding in a court of the United States, whether under this section or otherwise, in which a receiver or trustee is appointed for any registered holding company, or any subsidiary company thereof, the court may constitute and appoint the Commission as sole trustee or receiver, subject to the directions and orders of the court, whether or not a trustee or receiver shall theretofore have been appointed, and in any such proceeding the court shall not appoint any person other than the Commission as trustee or receiver without notifying the Commission and giving it an opportunity to be heard before making any such appointment. In any such proceeding a reorganization plan for a registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof shall not become effective unless such plan shall have been approved by the Commission after opportunity for hearing prior to its submission to the court. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any such reorganization plan may be proposed in the first instance by the Commission or, subject to such rules and regulations as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, by any person having a bona fide interest (as defined by the rules and regulations of the Commission) in the reorganization. The Commission may, by such rules and regulations or order as it may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, require that any or all fees, expenses, and remuneration, to whomsoever paid, in connection with any reorganization, dissolution, liquidation, bankruptcy, or receivership of a registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, in any such proceeding, shall be subject to approval by the Commission.

(g) It shall be unlawful for any person to solicit or permit the use of his or its name to solicit, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, any proxy, consent, authorization, power of attorney, deposit, or dissent in respect of any reorganization plan under this section, or otherwise, or in respect of any plan under this section for the divestment of control, securities, or other assets, or for the dissolution of any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof unless—

(1) the plan has been proposed by the Commission, or the plan and such information regarding it and its sponsors as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers has been submitted to the Commission by a person having a bona fide interest (as defined by the rules and regulations of the Commission) in such reorganization;

(2) each such solicitation is accompanied or preceded by a copy of a report on the plan which shall be made by the Commission after an opportunity for a hearing on the plan and other plans submitted to it, or by an abstract of such report made or approved by the Commission; and

(3) each such solicitation is made not in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

Nothing in this subsection or the rules and regulations thereunder shall prevent any person from appearing before the Commission or any court through an attorney or proxy.

INTERCOMPANY LOANS; DIVIDENDS; FEES; SALE OF SECURITIES AND CAPITAL ASSETS; PROXIES AND OTHER TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 12. (a) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, to borrow, or to receive any extension of credit or indemnity, from any public-utility company in the same holding-company system or from any subsidiary company of such holding company, but it shall not be unlawful under this subsection to renew, or extend the time of, any loan, credit, or indemnity outstanding on the date of the enactment of this title.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to declare or pay any dividend on any security of such company or to acquire, retire, or redeem any security of such company, in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate to protect the financial integrity of companies in holding-company systems, to safeguard the working capital of public-utility companies, to prevent the payment of dividends out of capital or unearned surplus, or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to sell any security or capital assets in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders regarding the consideration to be received for such sale, maintenance of competitive conditions, fees and commissions, accounts, disclosure of interest, and similar matters as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

(e) It shall be unlawful for any person to solicit or to permit the use of his or its name to solicit, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, any proxy, power of attorney, consent, or authorization regarding any security of a registered holding company or a subsidiary company thereof in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

(f) It shall be unlawful for any registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to negotiate, enter into, or take any step in the performance of any transaction not otherwise unlawful under this title, with any company in the same holding company system or with any affiliate of a company in such holding company system in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders regarding reports, accounts, costs, maintenance of competitive conditions, disclosure of interest, duration of contracts, and similar matters as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder.

(g) It shall be unlawful for any affiliate of any public utility company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or for any affiliate of any public utility company engaged in interstate commerce, or of any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to negotiate, enter into, or take any step in the performance of any transaction not otherwise unlawful under this title, with any such company of which it is an affiliate, in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders regarding reports, accounts, costs, maintenance of competitive conditions, disclosure of interest, duration of contracts, and similar matters as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

SERVICE, SALES, AND CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS

SEC. 13. (a) After April 1, 1936, it shall be unlawful—

(1) for any registered holding company, or subsidiary company thereof (other than a mutual service company), by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to enter into or take any step in the performance of any service, sales, or construction contract by which such company undertakes to perform services or construction work for, or sell goods to, any associate company thereof which is a public-utility or mutual service company;

(2) for any registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, which is a public-utility company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to enter into or take any step in the performance of any service, sales, or construction contract, by which such company undertakes to receive services, buy goods, or accept construction work, from any person (other than a mutual service company) engaged in the business of performing service, sales, or construction contracts for public-utility or holding companies if such business is, or purports to be, carried on by such person for such company as a cooperative, mutual, or nonprofit enterprise.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply to such transactions, involving special or unusual circumstances or not in the ordinary course of business, as the Federal Power Commission by rules and regulations or order may conditionally or unconditionally exempt as being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any affiliate of any public-utility company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or for an affiliate of any public-utility company engaged in interstate commerce, or of any registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to negotiate, enter into, or take any step in the performance of any service, sales, or construction contract, by which such affiliate undertakes to perform services or construction work for, or sell goods to, any such company of which it is an affiliate, in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders regarding reports, accounts, costs, maintenance of competitive conditions, disclosure of interest, duration of contracts, and similar matters, as the Federal Power Commission finds necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person, a substantial part of whose business is the performance of services, sales, or construction contracts for public-utility or holding companies, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, to enter into or take any step in the performance of any service, sales, or construction contract with any public-utility company, or for any such person, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to enter into or take any step in the performance of any service, sale, or construction contract with any public-utility company engaged in interstate commerce, or any registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof, in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders regarding reports, accounts, costs, maintenance of competitive conditions, disclosure of interest, duration of contracts, and similar matters as the Federal Power Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder. Such rules and regulations shall require any such person engaged in interstate commerce in the business of performing service, sales, or construction contracts for public-utility or holding companies on a cooperative, mutual, or nonprofit basis to be approved under this section as a mutual service company.

(e) A person may apply to be approved as a mutual service company for the purpose of making and performing service, sales, or construction contracts with public-utility or holding companies by filing with the Federal Power Commission an application in such form and containing such information, classified and in such detail, and accompanied by such documents, as the Federal Power Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, in respect of—

(1) the articles of incorporation, agreement, association, or cooperation under which the applicant will do business and its bylaws or rules or instruments, whatever the name, corresponding thereto;

(2) the ownership of the applicant, whether by ownership of securities or otherwise, and the relations and agreements between the applicant and its owner or owners;

(3) the identity of the member companies of the applicant, and the agreement or agreements under which such member companies are to share in its expenses and revenues and the method by which such shares are determined and to be maintained or adjusted;

(4) the kinds of service, sales, or construction contracts to be performed by the applicant; and

(5) the business, if any, other than the performance of service, sales, or construction contracts with member companies, in which the applicant purposes to engage.

(f) Within such reasonable time after the filing of an application as the Federal Power Commission shall fix by rules or regulations or order, the Federal Power Commission shall enter an order either approving or, after notice and opportunity for hearing, disapproving the applicant as a mutual service company, unless the applicant shall withdraw its application. Amendments to an application may be made upon such terms and conditions as the Federal Power Commission may prescribe.

(g) The Federal Power Commission shall not approve, or continue the approval of, the applicant as a mutual service company unless (1) in the judgment of the Federal Power Commission the applicant is so organized as to ownership, costs, revenues, and the sharing thereof as reasonably to insure the efficient and economical performance of service, sales, or construction contracts by the applicant for member companies, at cost fairly and equitably allocated among such member companies, at a reasonable saving to member companies over the cost to such companies of comparable contracts performed by independent persons, and (2) membership of the applicant is to be open on substantially similar terms to all public utility companies similarly situated, except for such limitation on membership, in cases where an increase therein would result in a disproportionate increase in cost, as the Federal Power Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(h) The Federal Power Commission, in any order approving a company as a mutual service company, may prescribe such terms and conditions regarding the continuance of such approval, the nature and enforcement of the agreements of such mutual service company for the sharing of expenses and the distributing of revenues among member companies, and matters relating to such agreements, and the nature, character, and extent of the business which may be carried on by such mutual service company as the Federal Power Commission may find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder.

(i) Every mutual service company shall file with the Federal Power Commission such information and documents in respect of its service, sales, and construction contracts, the composition of its membership, the manner and method of sharing expenses and distributing revenues, and similar matters, as the Federal Power Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(j) It shall be unlawful for any mutual service company, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, to engage in any business, or enter into or perform any transaction, in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders regarding the nature and types of businesses and transactions in which such companies may engage, the manner of engaging therein, the limitation of membership in such companies for one or more purposes to specified classes of member companies or to member companies carrying on business in a limited region, maintenance of competitive conditions, costs, disclosure of interest, relations with member companies and affiliates, and similar matters, as the Federal Power Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this section or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder.

(k) The Federal Power Commission, after notice and opportunity for hearing, may revoke, suspend, or modify the approval given any mutual service company if it finds that such company has violated any provision of this title or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, or that such company is not operated efficiently, economically, and in good faith, solely in the interest of its member companies. The Federal Power Commission, upon its own motion or at the request of a member company or a State commission, may, after notice and opportunity for hearing, require a reallocation or reapportionment of costs among member companies of a mutual service company if it finds the existing allocation inequitable and may require the elimination of a service or services to a member company which does not bear its fair proportion of costs or which, by reason of its size or other circumstances, does not require such service or services.

(l) The Federal Power Commission shall from time to time conduct investigations regarding the making, performance, and costs of service, sales, and construction contracts, the economies resulting therefrom, and the desirability thereof. On the basis of such investigations the Federal Power Commission shall classify the different types of such contracts and the work done thereunder, and shall make recommendations from time to time regarding the standards and scope of such contracts in relation to public-utility companies of different kinds and sizes and the costs incurred thereunder and economies resulting therefrom. Such recommendations shall be made available to State commissions, public-utility companies, and to the public in such form and at such reasonable charge as the Federal Power Commission may prescribe.

PERIODIC AND OTHER REPORTS

SEC. 14. Every registered holding company shall file with the Commission, and every mutual service company shall file with the Federal Power Commission, such annual, quarterly, and other periodic and special reports, the answers to such specific questions and the minutes of such directors', stockholders', and other meetings, as the respective Commission may by rules and regulations or order prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. Such reports, if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission having jurisdiction thereof, shall be certified by an independent public accountant, and shall be made and filed at such time and in such form and detail as such Commission shall prescribe. The Commission may require that there be included in reports filed with it such information and documents as it finds necessary or appropriate to keep reasonably current the information filed under section 5, and such further information concerning the financial condition, security structure, security holdings, assets, and cost thereof, wherever determinable, and affiliations of the reporting company and the associate companies and affiliates thereof as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. The Federal Power Commission may require that there be included in reports filed with it such information and documents as it deems necessary or appropriate to keep reasonably current the information filed under section 13, and such further information concerning the financial condition, transactions, businesses, assets, and cost thereof, wherever determinable, membership, relations with member companies, and similar matters as the Federal Power Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(e) The Commission, by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest and for the protection of investors or consumers may prescribe for persons subject to the provisions of subsection (a) or (b) of this section, and the Federal Power Commission, by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest and for the protection of investors or consumers may prescribe for persons subject to the provisions of subsection (c) or (d) of this section, uniform methods for keeping accounts required under any provision of this section, including, among other things, the manner in which the cost of all assets, whenever determinable, shall be shown, the methods of classifying and segregating accounts, and the manner in which cost-accounting procedures shall be maintained.

(g) All accounts, cost-accounting procedures, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records kept or required to be kept by persons subject to any provision of this section shall be subject at any time and from time to time to such reasonable periodic, special, and other examinations by the commission having jurisdiction thereof, or any member or representative thereof, as such commission may prescribe. The burden of proof to justify any accounting entry questioned by the commission having jurisdiction thereof shall be on the person making or authorizing such entry. The commission having jurisdiction thereof, after notice and opportunity for hearing, may prescribe the account or accounts in which particular outlays, receipts, and other transactions shall be entered, charged, or credited and the manner in which such entry, charge, or credit shall be made, and may require an entry to be modified or supplemented so as properly to show the cost of any asset or any other cost.

(h) It shall be the duty of every registered holding company and of every subsidiary company thereof (other than a mutual service company) and of every affiliate of a company insofar as such affiliate is subject to any provision of this title or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, to submit the accounts, cost-accounting procedures, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records of such holding company, subsidiary company, or affiliate to such examinations, in person or by duly appointed attorney, by the holder of any security of such holding company, subsidiary company, or affiliate as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

(j) Upon application of any person entitled, under the provisions of subsection (h) or (i) of this section, to examine any account, cost-accounting procedure, correspondence, memorandum, paper, book, or other record of a registered holding company, a subsidiary company of a registered holding company, a mutual service company, an affiliate of a company, or a person engaged in the business of a performing service, sales, or construction contracts for public utility or holding companies, the district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any such company or person to submit any such account, cost-accounting procedure, correspondence, memorandum, paper, book, or other record to such examination.

OFFICERS, DIRECTORS, AND OTHER AFFILIATES

SEC. 17. (a) Every person who is an officer, director, or other affiliate of a registered holding company shall file with the Commission in such form as the Commission shall prescribe (1) at the time of the registration of such holding company, or within 10 days after such person becomes an officer, director, or other affiliate, a statement of the securities of such registered holding company or any subsidiary company thereof of which he is, directly or indirectly, the beneficial owner, and (2) within 10 days after the close of each calendar month thereafter, if there has been any change in such ownership during such month, a statement of such ownership as of the close of such calendar month and of the changes in such ownership that have occurred during such calendar month.

INVESTIGATIONS; INJUNCTIONS AND PROSECUTIONS OF OFFENSES

SEC. 18. (a) The Commission, in its discretion, may investigate any facts, conditions, practices, or matters which it may deem necessary or appropriate to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder, or to aid in the enforcement of the provisions of this title in the prescribing of rules and regulations thereunder, or in obtaining information to serve as a basis for recommending further legislation concerning the matters to which this title relates. The Commission may require or permit any person to file with it a statement in writing, under oath or otherwise as it shall determine, as to any or all facts and circumstances concerning a matter which may be the subject of investigation. The Commission, in its discretion, may publish or make available to State commissions or the public information concerning any such subject.

(b) The Commission upon its own motion or at the request of a State commission may investigate, or obtain any information regarding the business, financial condition, or practices of any registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof or facts, conditions, practices, or matters affecting the relations between any such company and any other company or companies in the same holding-company system.

(c) For the purpose of any investigation or any other proceeding under this title, any member of the Commission, or any officer thereof designated by it, is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, or other records which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of any such records may be required from any place in any State or in any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at any designated place of hearing.

(d) In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction in which such investigation or proceeding is carried on, or where such person resides or carries on business, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, and other records. And such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or member or officer designated by the Commission, there to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district whereof such person is an inhabitant or wherever he may be found or may be doing business. Any person who, without just cause, shall fail or refuse to attend and testify or to answer any lawful inquiry or to produce books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, or other records, if in his or its power so to do, in obedience to the subpena of the Commission shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than 1 year, or both.

(e) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, contracts, agreements, or other records and documents before the Commission, or in obedience to the subpena of the Commission or any member thereof or any officer designated by it, or in any cause or proceeding instituted by the Commission, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

(f) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that any person is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of this title, or of any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, it may in its discretion bring an action in the proper district court of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, to enjoin such acts or practices and to enforce compliance with this title or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or decree or restraining order shall be granted without bond. Attorneys employed by the Commission may appear for or represent the Commission in any proceeding in court. The Commission may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General, who, in his discretion, may institute the appropriate criminal proceedings under this title.

(g) Upon application of the Commission, the district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of this title or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder.

SEC. 19. Hearings may be public and may be held before the Commission, any member or members thereof, or any officer or officers of the Commission designated by it, and appropriate records thereof shall be kept. In any proceedings before the Commission, the Commission, in accordance with such rules and regulations as it may prescribe, may admit as a party any interested State, State commission, State securities commission, municipality, or other political subdivision of a State or any representative of interested consumers or security holders, or any other person whose participation in the proceedings may be in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 20. The Commission shall have authority from time to time to make, issue, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations and such orders as it may deem necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title, including rules and regulations defining accounting, technical and trade terms used in this title. Among other things, the Commission shall have authority, for the purposes of this title, to prescribe the form or forms in which information required in any statement, declaration, application, report or other document filed with the Commission shall be set forth, the items or details to be shown in balance sheets, profit and loss statements, and surplus accounts, the manner in which the cost of all assets, whenever determinable, shall be shown in regard to such statements, declarations, applications, reports, and other documents filed with the Commission, or accounts required to be kept by the rules, regulations, or orders of the Commission, and the methods to be followed in the keeping of accounts and cost accounting procedures and the preparation of reports, in the segregation and allocation of costs, in the determination of liabilities, in the determination of depreciation and depletion, in the differentiation of recurring and nonrecurring income, in the differentiation of investment and operating income, and in the keeping or preparation, where the Commission deems it necessary or appropriate, of separate or consolidated balance sheets or profit and loss statements for any companies in the same holding company system. In the case of the accounts of any company whose methods of accounting are prescribed under the provisions of any law of the United States or of any State, the rules and regulations of the Commission in respect of account shall not be inconsistent with the requirements imposed by such law or any rule or regulation thereunder; nor shall anything in this title relieve any public utility company from the duty to keep the accounts, books, records, or memoranda which may be required to be kept by the law of any State in which it operates or by the State commission of any such State. But this provision shall not prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements regarding reports or accounts as it may deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers. The rules and regulations of the Commission shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Commission shall prescribe. For the purpose of its rules and regulations the Commission may classify persons and matters within its jurisdiction and prescribe different requirements for different classes of persons or matters. The Commission, by such rules and regulations or order as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers, may authorize the filing of any information or documents required to be filed with the Commission under this title, or under the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, or under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, by incorporating by reference any information or documents theretofore or concurrently filed with the Commission under this title or either of such acts. No provision of this title imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission, notwithstanding that such rule, regulation, or order may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason.

EFFECT ON EXISTING LAW

SEC. 21. Nothing in this title shall affect the jurisdiction of the Commission under the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, or the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 over any person, security, or contract, or the rights, obligations, duties, or liabilities of any person thereunder; nor shall anything in this title affect the jurisdiction of any other commission, board, agency, or officer of the United States or of any State or political subdivision of any State, over any person, security, or contract, insofar as such jurisdiction does not conflict with any provision of this title or any rule, regulation, or order thereunder. Nothing in this title shall exempt any public-utility company from obedience to the law of any State in which it operates.

INFORMATION FILED WITH THE COMMISSION

SEC. 22. (a) Unless in the judgment of the Commission such information is confidential in nature and the disclosure thereof would be not in the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers, the information contained in any statement, application, declaration, report, or other document filed with the Commission shall be available to the public, and copies thereof may be furnished to any person at such reasonable charge and under such reasonable limitations as the Commission may prescribe: Provided, however, That nothing in this title shall be construed to require, or to authorize the Commission to require, the revealing of trade secrets or processes in any application, declaration, report, or document filed with the Commission under this title.

(b) Any person filing such application, declaration, report, or document may make written objection to the public disclosure of information contained therein, stating the grounds for such objection, and the Commission is authorized to hear objections in any such case where it finds advisable.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any member, officer, or employee of the Commission to disclose to any person other than a member, officer, or employee of the Commission, or to use for personal benefit, any information contained in any application, declaration, report, or document filed with the Commission which is not made available to the public pursuant to this section.

COURT REVIEW OF ORDERS

SEC. 24. (a) Any person aggrieved by an order issued by the Commission in a proceeding under this title to which such person is a party may obtain a review of such order in the circuit court of appeals of the United States within any circuit wherein such person resides, or has his principal place of business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within 60 days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be modified or set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon any member of the Commission, or upon any officer thereof designated by the Commission for that purpose, and thereupon the Commission shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. Upon the filing of such transcript such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, or set aside such order, in whole or in part. No objection to the order of the Commission shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Commission or unless there were reasonable grounds for failure so to do. The finding of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive. If any party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the Commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file with the court such modified or new findings, which, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order. The judgment and decree of the court affirming, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the Commission shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Commission's order.

SEC. 25. The district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of violations of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder and of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by, or to enjoin any violation of, this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder. Any criminal proceeding may be brought in the district wherein any act or transaction constituting the violation occurred. Any suit or action to enforce any liability or duty created by, or to enjoin any violation of, this title or rules, regulations, or orders thereunder, may be brought in any such district or in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, and process in such cases may be served in any district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or transacts business or wherever the defendant may be found. Judgments and decreees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 225 and 347). No costs shall be assessed for or against the Commission or the Federal Power Commission in any proceeding under this title brought by or against either such Commission in any court.

"Whenever, in the judgment of the Commission, the development of any water-power resources for public purposes should be undertaken by the United States itself, the Commission shall not approve any application for any project affecting such development, but shall cause to be made such examinations, surveys, reports, plans, and estimates of the cost of the proposed development as it may find necessary, and shall submit its findings to Congress with such recommendations as it may find appropriate concerning such development."

SEC. 206. Section 10 of the Federal Water Power Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. All licenses issued under this part shall be on the following conditions:

"(b) That except when emergency shall require for the protection of navigation, life, health, or property, no substantial alteration or addition not in conformity with the approved plans shall be made to any dam or other project works constructed hereunder of an installed capacity in excess of 100 horsepower without the prior approal of the Commission; and any emergency alteration or addition so made shall thereafter be subject to such modification and change as the Commission may direct.

"(c) That the licensee shall maintain the project works in a condition of repair adequate for the purposes of navigation and for the efficient operation of said works in the development and transmission of power, shall make all necessary renewals and replacements, shall establish and maintain adequate depreciation reserves for such purposes, shall so maintain and operate said works as not to impair navigation, and shall conform to such rules and regulations as the Commission may from time to time prescribe for the protection of life, health, and property. Each licensee hereunder shall be liable for all damages occasioned to the property of others by the construction, maintenance, and operation of the project works or of the works appurtenant or accessory thereto, constructed under the license, and in no event shall the United States be liable therefor.

"(d) That after the first 20 years of operation, out of surplus earned thereafter, if any, accumulated in excess of a specified reasonable rate of return upon the net investment of a licensee in any project or projects under license, the licensee shall establish and maintain amortization reserves, which reserves shall, in the discretion of the Commission, be held until the termination of the license or be applied from time to time in reduction of the net investment. Such specified rate of return and the proportion of such surplus earnings to be paid into and held in such reserves shall be set forth in the license.

"(e) That the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the Commission for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the costs of the administration of this part; for recompensing it for the use, occupancy, and enjoyment of its lands or other property; and for the expropriation to the Government of excessive profits until the respective States shall make provisions for preventing excessive profits or for the expropriation thereof to themselves, or until the period of amortization as herein provided is reached, and in fixing such charges the Commission shall seek to avoid increasing the price to the consumers of power by such charges, and any such charges may be adjusted from time to time by the Commission as conditions may require: Provided, That when licenses are issued involving the use of Government dams or other structures owned by the United States or tribal lands embraced within Indian reservations the Commission shall, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior in the case of such dams or structures in reclamation projects and, in the case of such tribal lands, subject to the approval of the Indian tribe having jurisdiction of such lands as provided in section 16 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984) fix a reasonable annual charge for the use thereof, and such charges may with like approval be readjusted by the Commission at the end of 20 years after the project is available for service and at periods of not less than 10 years thereafter upon notice and opportunity for hearing: Provided further, That licenses for the development, transmission, or distribution of power by States or municipalities shall be issued and enjoyed without charge to the extent such power is sold to the public without profit or is used by such State or municipality for State or municipality purposes, except that as to projects constructed or to be constructed by States or municipalities primarily designed to provide or improve navigation, licenses therefor shall be issued without charge; and that licenses for the development, transmission, or distribution of power for domestic, mining, or other beneficial use in projects of not more than 100 horsepower installed capacity may be issued without charge, except on tribal lands within Indian reservations; but in no case shall a license be issued free of charge for the development and utilization of power created by any Government dam and that the amount charged therefor in any license shall be such as determined by the Commission. In the event an overpayment of any charge due under this section shall be made by a licensee, the Commission is authorized to allow a credit for such overpayment when charges are due for any subsequent period.

"(f) That whenever any licensee hereunder is directly benefited by the construction work of another licensee, a permittee, or of the United States of a storage reservoir or other headwater improvement, the Commission shall require as a condition of the license that the licensee so benefited shall reimburse the owner of such reservoir or other improvements for such part of the annual charges for interest, maintenance, and depreciation thereon as the Commission may deem equitable. The proportion of such charges to be paid by any licensee shall be determined by the Commission. The licensees or permittees affected shall pay to the United States the cost of making such determination as fixed by the Commission.

"Whenever such reservoir or other improvement is constructed by the United States the Commission shall assess similar charges against any licensee directly benefited thereby, and any amount so assessed shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be reserved and appropriated as a part of the special fund for headwater improvements as provided in section 17 hereof.

"Whenever any power project not under license is benefited by the construction work of a licensee or permittee, the United States or any agency thereof, the Commission, after notice to the owner or owners of such unlicensed project, shall determine and fix a reasonable and equitable annual charge to be paid to the licensee or permittee on account of such benefits, or to the United States if it be the owner of such headwater improvement.

"(g) Such other conditions not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as the Commission may require.

"(h) That combinations, agreements, arrangements, or understandings, express or implied, to limit the output of electrical energy, to restrain trade, or to fix, maintain, or increase prices for electrical energy or service are hereby prohibited.

"(i) In issuing licenses for a minor part only of a complete project, or for a complete project of not more than 100 horsepower installed capacity, the Commission may in its discretion waive such conditions, provisions, and requirements of this part, except the license period of 50 years, as it may deem to be to the public interest to waive under the circumstances: Provided, That the provisions hereof shall not apply to annual charges for use of lands within Indian reservations."

SEC. 207. Section 14 of the Federal Water Power Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. Upon not less than 2 years' notice in writing from the Commission the United States shall have the right upon or after the expiration of any license to take over and thereafter to maintain and operate any project or projects as defined in section 3 hereof, and covered in whole or in part by the license, or the right to take over upon mutual agreement with the licensee all property owned and held by the licensee then valuable and serviceable in the development, transmission, or distribution of power and which is then dependent for its usefulness upon the continuance of the license, together with any lock or locks or other aids to navigation constructed at the expense of the licensee, upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the net investment of the licensee in the project or projects taken, not to exceed the fair value of the property taken, plus such reasonable damages, if any, to property of the licensee valuable, serviceable, and dependent as above set forth but not taken, as may be caused by the severance therefrom of property taken, and shall assume all contracts entered into by the licensee with the approval of the Commission. The net investment of the licensee in the project or projects so taken and the amount of such severance damages, if any, shall be determined by the Commission after notice and opportunity for hearing. Such net investment shall not include or be affected by the value of any lands, rights-of-way, or other property of the United States licensed by the Commission under this act, by the license or by goodwill, going value, or prospective revenues; nor shall the values allowed for water rights, rights-of-way, lands, or interest in lands be in excess of the actual reasonable cost thereof at the time of acquisition by the licensee: Provided, That the right of the United States or any State or municipality to take over, maintain, and operate any project licensed under this act at any time by condemnation proceedings upon payment of just compensation is hereby expressly reserved."

SEC. 208. Section 17 of the Federal Water Power Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

The proceeds of charges made by the Commission for the purpose of reimbursing the United States for the costs of the administration of this part shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to miscellaneous receipts.

"(b) In case of delinquency on the part of any licensee in the payment of annual charges a penalty of 1 percent of the total amount delinquent shall be added to the total charges for each month or part of a month in which the licensee is so delinquent until the total of the charges and penalties are paid or until the license is canceled and the charges and penalties satisfied in accordance with law."

The operation of any navigation facilities which may be constructed as a part of or in connection with any dam or division structure built under the provisions of this act, whether at the expense of a licensee hereunder or of the United States, shall at all times be controlled by such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by such dam or diversion structure as may be made from time to time by the Secretary of War; and for willful failure to comply with any such rule or regulation such licensee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in section 313 hereof."

SEC. 210. Section 23 of the Federal Power Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. (a) The provisions of this part shall not be construed as affecting any permit or valid existing right-of-way heretofore granted or as confirming or otherwise affecting any claim, or as affecting any authority heretofore given pursuant to law, but any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality holding or possessing such permit, right-of-way, or authority may apply for a license hereunder, and upon such application the Commission may issue to any such applicant a license in accordance with the provisions of this title, and in such case the provisions of this act shall apply to such applicant as a licensee hereunder: Provided, That when application is made for a license under this section for a project or projects already constructed the fair value of said project or projects determined as provided in this section, shall for the purposes of this title and of said license be deemed to be the amount to be allowed as the net investment of the applicant in such project or projects as of the date of such license, or as of the date of such determination, if license has not been issued. Such fair value shall be determined by the Commission after notice and opportunity for hearing.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, State, or municipality, for the purpose of developing electric power, to construct, operate, or maintain any dam, water conduit, reservoir, powerhouse, or other works across, along, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands or reservations of the United States (including the Territories), or utilize the surplus water or water power from any Government dam, except under and in accordance with the terms of a permit or valid existing right-of-way granted prior to June 10, 1920, or a license granted pursuant to this act: Provided, That States or other municipalities granted certain rights and privileges under the Boulder Canyon Project Act and contracts executed thereunder relative to the use of water impounded by such project and the generation of hydroelectric power upon such project are hereby granted a license to construct, operate, and maintain any water conduit, reservoir, power lines, or other works across or along the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands or reservations of the United States for the purpose of utilizing said water or water power. A similar license is hereby granted to any State or other municipality with reference to any Government dam heretofore or hereafter constructed under act of Congress where States or other municipalities are granted the right to utilize the waters or water power generated at such dam. This license shall extend to all municipalities, corporations, or individuals acting for, under, and by authority of such State or other municipality in the premises. Any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality intending to construct a dam or other project works across, along, over, or in any stream or part thereof, other than those defined herein as navigable waters, and over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce between foreign nations and among the several States shall before such construction file declaration of such intention with the Commission, whereupon the Commission shall cause immediate investigation of such proposed construction to be made, and if upon investigation it shall find that the interests of interstate or foreign commerce would be directly affected or burdened by such proposed construction, such person, association, corporation, State, or municipality shall not construct, maintain, or operate such dam or other project works until it shall have applied for and shall have received a license under the provisions of this act. If the Commission shall not so find, and if no public lands or reservations are injuriously affected, permission is hereby granted to construct such dam or other project works in such stream upon compliance with State laws. If the applicant is a State and the Commission shall not find that such proposed construction does directly affect or burden interstate commerce permission is hereby granted said State to use the public lands and reservations within such State to the extent that may be necessary to such project and in a manner that will not be materially injurious to such public lands and reservations: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to the United States or to any agency thereof.

SEC. 211. Section 24 of the Federal Water Power Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. Any lands of the United States included in any proposed project under the provisions of this part shall from the date of filing of application therefor be reserved from entry, location, or other disposal under the laws of the United States until otherwise directed by the Commission or by Congress. Notice that such application has been made, together with the date of filing thereof and a description of the lands of the United States affected thereby, shall be filed in the local land office for the district in which such lands are located. Whenever the Commission shall determine that the value of any lands of the United States so applied for, or heretofore or hereafter reserved or classified as power sites, will not be injured or destroyed for the purposes of power development by location, entry, or selection under the public-land laws, the Secretary of the Interior, upon notice of such determination, shall declare such lands open to location, entry, or selection, for such purpose or purposes and under such restrictions as the Commission may determine, subject to and with a reservation of the right of the United States or its permittees or licensees to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of said lands necessary, in the judgment of the Commission, for the purposes of this title, which right shall be expressly reserved in every patent issued for such lands hereunder may enter thereupon for the purposes accrue from the occupation or use of any of said lands for said purposes. The United States or any licensee for any such lands; and no claim or right to compensation shall of this part, upon payment of any damages to crops, buildings, or other improvements caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond to the United States for the use and benefit of the owner to secure the payment of such damages as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond in a court of competent jurisdiction, said bond to be in the form prescribed by the Commission: Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore made for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section.

SEC. 212. Sections 1 to 29, inclusive, of the Federal Water Power Act, as amended, shall constitute part I of that act, and sections 25 and 30 of such act as amended, are repealed.

The Federal Water Power Act, as amended, is further amended by adding thereto the following parts:

"PART II. REGULATION OF ELECTRIC UTILITY COMPANIES ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE

"APPLICATION OF PART

"SECTION 201. (a) It is hereby declared that the business of generating, transmitting, and selling electric energy for ultimate distribution to the public is affected with a public interest, and that Federal regulation of that part of said business which consists of the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce and the generation of electric energy for such transmission and sale is necessary in the public interest. It is further declared to be the policy of Congress to extend Federal regulation to those matters which cannot be regulated by the States, and also to exert Federal authority to strengthen and assist the States in the exercise of their regulatory powers and not to impair or diminish the powers of any State commission.

"(b) The provisions of this part shall apply to the transmission of electric energy in interstate commerce, to the sale of electric energy at wholesale in interstate commerce, and to the production of electric energy for such transmission or sale, but shall not apply to the retail sale of such energy in local distribution. The Commission shall have jurisdiction over all facilities for such production, transmission, or sale of electric energy by any means and over all facilities connected therewith as parts of a system of power transmission situated in more than one State, except facilities used only for the production or transmission of electric energy in intrastate commerce or in local distribution or for the use of the producer or transmitter. Every person who owns or operates facilities subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission under this part shall be subject to the provisions of this part and the part next following.

"(c) Electric energy shall be held to be transmitted in interstate commerce within the meaning of this part if transmitted from a State to any point outside thereof; or from or to any place in the United States to and from a foreign country, but only so far as such transmission takes place within the United States; but electric energy shall not be held to be transmitted in interstate commerce within the meaning of this part if transmitted between points within the same State but through any point outside thereof.

"(d) The term 'public utility' when used in this part or in the part next following means any person who owns or operates facilities subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission under this title.

"(e) No provision in this part shall apply to, or be deemed to include, the United States, a State, or any municipality or other political subdivision of a State, or any agency, authority, or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, or any corporation which is wholly owned, directly or indirectly, by any one or more of the foregoing, or any officer, agent, or employee of any of the foregoing acting as such in the course of his official duty, unless such provision makes specific reference thereto.

"(f) Electric energy shall be held to be sold at wholesale in interstate commerce within the meaning of this part only when it is sold for resale after its transmission in interstate commerce or before such transmission if the same is thereafter so transmitted.

"(g) The provisions of this part shall apply only to the regulation of the transmission or sale in interstate commerce of electric energy.

"INTERCONNECTION AND COORDINATION OF FACILITIES

"SEC. 202. (a) For the purpose of assuring an abundant supply of electric energy throughout the United States with the greatest possible economy and with regard to the proper utilization and conservation of natural resources, the Commission is empowered and directed to divide the country into regional districts for the interconnection and coordination of electric facilities. Each such district shall embrace an area which, in the judgment of the Commission, can economically be served by such interconnected and coordinated electric facilities. With each such district and between such districts, such interconnection and coordination shall as far as——

Mr. SIROVICH. I think the gentleman has a very informative presentation, and I think we ought to have a quorum present.

BILL CONSIDERED 5 MONTHS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I hardly expected that the delay would be caused from some sources, but some people want to give added evidence to their standing on public questions. We have had this bill in committee for 5 long months. There has never been a bill before the Congress of the United States that had any longer, more conscientious, and, with the ability of the members of the committee, a more real consideration than this bill has had. We have done our work under rather trying circumstances.

MISREPRESENTED THROUGH PROPAGANDA

The bill, from the hour it was introduced until now, from every section of this land, in my opinion, has been more misrepresented through propaganda in the mail, by telegrams, and advertisements in the newspapers than any bill that has had the consideration of this Congress in the last half century. Motives have been impugned. Backstage talk has been indulged in. Advertisements have appeared in newspapers as to what this bill means and what it does not mean. In my own State I know that circulars were put out through the mails and placed in envelops with electric-light bills in which every paragraph of the advertisement or the circular either contained an unknowing or deliberate misrepresentation of the facts with reference to this bill. I shall deal with some of that a little later. I may say, however, that to those of us who are responsible for bringing here this legislation, the Post Office Department, the telephone companies, and the telegraph companies at least should be very grateful.

I am embarrassed by the time I must take. We have only 4 hours to the side. There are 19 members on the majority side of this committee, and all of them know things about this bill. If they had 10 minutes apiece, it would take practically all of the time. In order that I may not ramble in what I am going to say and in order that I may say it in the time that I want to use, I shall speak from a manuscript, because I do not want to get outside the record.

WHAT IS HOLDING COMPANY?

Mr. Chairman, it may not be amiss for a moment to talk about what a holding company is, and then to give some of the background and what they were formed for and what they have been doing. I want to say to the Committee now that so far as I am concerned, after all of the pummeling and the pounding of the last 5 months, I have not changed my position on the essential aspects of the bill as originally introduced. [Applause.]

A holding company is a corporation primarily organized to own securities issued by other corporations. Commissioner Walter M. W. Splawn, one of the ablest and best men who ever served this or any other Government, who was special counsel to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce during the holding-company inquiries, has defined the holding company as follows:

> The holding company may be defined as any company which, by virtue of its ownership of securities, is in a position to control or substantially influence the management of one or more other companies; that is, a holding company is different from a mere investment company. An investment company buys securities as an investor would do and without any purpose of determining the policy of the management. But when a company by virtue of its ownership of securities is in a position to control or substantially to influence the management of another company it is properly classified as a holding company.

HOLDING COMPANIES EXIST BY REASON OF TECHNICALITIES AND LOOPHOLES IN LAW

Originally a corporation did not have the right to own stock of another company. At common law that was regarded as an unthinkable practice. Courts permitted banks to hold stocks which had been used as collateral only until they could be disposed of in the interest of the stockholders of the bank. Less than 50 years ago legislatures in New Jersey and other States began to authorize by general statutes the creation of corporations which would have the power to own shares in other companies. During the past generation the ablest legal talent in the country has been diligently devising ways and means by which the power of an artificial creature, a corporation, could be extended to control and own and deal in evidences of property rights and certificates of stock of other companies. The results of this ingenuity of able lawyers to persuade legislatures to write cunning statutes and courts to place shrewd constructions on those statutes has given the American people a master in the form of a holding company. This master is soulless, impersonal, intangible, immortal, and wellnigh all-powerful. This creature of our statutes holds under its control billions of dollars' worth of property scattered throughout the country, and sometimes around the world. Its decisions can shut down mills, move factories, reduce employees to a state of serfdom, strip the stockholders of local companies of their equities, siphon off the earnings of profitable companies beyond the reach of their stockholders to the stockholders of other companies. This creature of our imagination is permitted to act as a normal person, to contribute to campaign funds in municipal, State, and National elections; to hire clever writers to carry on campaigns of propaganda; to centralize the control of industry.

BUY AND SELL TO THEMSELVES, FIXING OWN PRICES WHICH CONSUMERS PAY

These creatures of our legal ingenuity are operated by a few clever men. They are used as the agencies for disfranchising stockholders of thousands of necessary and prosperous operating companies. They are used to take the control and direction of these local companies away from those who built them and place it in a city oftentimes far removed. Through the simple device of pyramiding, a small investment by those in control of the top holding company enables them to do as they like with hundreds of millions, and in some instances even billions, of other people's property. In one system the pyramiding goes so far as to pile one company on top of another until there are 10 corporations in the pyramiding, or the local operating company is 9 companies removed from the corporation at the top which controls it, along with hundreds of others. In this particular set-up an investment of $1 at the top enables the managers of the top to control over $30,000 of book value of the operating companies, or with less than $50,000 to control over a billion dollars of book value. In another set-up by an investment of about $23,000 at the top of the pyramid book values of $1,200,000,000 are controlled. This pyramiding, supplemented by the use of service contracts and sometimes other practices, has made for a concentration of management that is staggering to the imagination. In one office building in New York City those in charge of a paper holding company, with a very small investment and scarcely any risk of their own capital, are able to control hundreds of operating companies scattered clear across the United States. They are able to say to those operating companies what they shall buy, from whom they shall buy, at what price, and with whom they shall engage services and contract for supplies. They will appoint someone in the top company or in one of their service subsidiaries to be secretary of many of the important operating companies. We found one case in which a man was secretary or an officer in more than 200 corporations. These paper companies at the top of the pyramid as a rule operate nothing. They claim that they are beyond the control of any State authority because they are not selling transportation or any public-utility service. They hold themselves out as investment companies. They have undertaken to get beyond the reach of Government.

I put into the RECORD here the 17 practices of holding companies which I spoke of last January:

REPREHENSIBLE PRACTICES OF HOLDING COMPANIES

First. They have been used in paper transactions to defeat assessments of income taxes to the Federal Government. The holding company appears to have been quite useful in creating fictions under which technical requirements of the Bureau of Internal Revenue could be circumvented.

Second. The holding company has lent itself to the abuse of paying its officers high salaries and bonuses, sometimes of astonishing magnitude. In 1925 a man by the name of Foshay received $306,000 in salary and bonuses. It turned out that the activities of his company became a national scandal. The ease with which the officers of a holding company, through salaries and bonuses and profits in intercompany trading in securities, are able to appropriate to themselves the earnings of operating utilities has been surpassed only by the secrecy of such actions. This secrecy was possible by reason of the holding company, and itself was an encouragement to avarice and irresponsible conduct.

Third. Another evil fostered by the holding company is fictitious stock subscriptions. Huge transactions have been effected by mere entries on books without any transfer of money or credit.

Fourth. It is in the power of the controlling holding company to make arbitrary apportionments of expenses to the operating companies. There is evidence that some holding companies apportioned to the operating companies the expenses of rendering services to them and at the same time collected from the companies fees for the services.

Fifth. There have been abuses in the appraisal of properties by the service companies controlled by the holding company at the head of the system. The California commission in one case found appraisals of properties within that State, which had been made under the direction of a holding company, twice as much as the California commission could allow. Again and again there appear in rate cases throughout the different States so-called "expert engineers and accountants" who give testimony as to the value of operating properties. These experts frequently qualify as being in the employ of a corporation skilled in making appraisals. The truth is that the corporation is frequently a subsidiary of a holding company owning the operating company whose rates are in litigation, and these so-called "experts" take their orders from the management of the top holding company. Instead of the appraisals having been made by independent engineers, they merely amount to self-serving declarations.

Sixth. These self-serving appraisals of operating properties by service organizations owned by the holding company have lent themselves to write-ups of assets. These write-ups, through juggling of accounts in response to appraisals under the control and at the direction of the holding company, have contributed to the deception of investors, of State regulatory authorities, and of consumers.

Seventh. The contracts with a service company imposed upon the operating companies by the top holding company have, in turn, been capitalized according to the value which the convenience of the management of the holding company seemed to dictate. Such a capitalization of service contracts is reflected in the accounts and financial structure of the system.

Eighth. A holding company lends itself to an inequitable distribution of securities. The insiders, those who direct the top holding company, are able to benefit at the expense of other stockholders.

Ninth. The abuses in the use of publicity by the direction of managements of the holding companies has become scandalous. Note:

THE MEN BEHIND THE W. B. FOSHAY CO.

An idea always originates with one individual. Every activity, whether in business or in other avenues of experience, had its beginning with a single person. Run down the list of scientists and inventors—there was Newton and the law of gravitation, Watt and the steam engine, Fulton and the steamboat, Marconi's cable, Bell and the telephone. Modern business institutions, such as the W. B. Foshay Co., are no exception. This company began modestly in one small room in the National-Soo Line Building, Minneapolis. That was 10 years ago. Mr. Foshay had the idea; he put it into execution. It came to him after many years of actual experience in the public-utility and financial field. He knew the business of producing gas and electricity from the power plant and gas works up to the executive's duties. * * *

Everyone calls to mind the actor who was hired to impersonate a counselor to investors in a series of radio broadcasts.

Tenth. Investors frequently do not distinguish between the regulated issues of securities by operating companies and the unregulated issues of the holding company at the head of the system. This confusion and the fact that the issues of the holding companies were not regulated resulted in losses to thousands of investors.

Eleventh. Holding companies have inflated their income by taking upon their books the earnings and the donated surplus of their subsidiaries without receiving the amounts in any form. These manipulations resulted in paying dividends out of what technically appeared to be earnings but which was in reality capital.

Twelfth. Manipulations of system securities by the top holding company have involved large purchases of stock by the holding company or its subsidiaries in order to support the market. Such manipulations have for a time resulted in fictitious market values and in a deception of the public. The reports on the top companies in the Insull system reveal a tragic collapse following huge manipulations which were prompted by misguided judgment, false pride, and overreaching personal ambition. The Insull debacle is an example of a successful and trusted management of large affairs having been destroyed through the manipulations and speculations made possible by reason of the existence of the holding company and the temptation to use it.

Thirteenth. The holding company has been able to earn large profits through contracts between a subsidiary service company and the controlled operating companies. There is now a wide-spread movement to render these services at cost, but so long as there is no possible dealing at arm's length, so long as contracts are dictated by the holding company which controls both the service organization and the operating companies served, just that long will the public have reason to fear that the charges to the operating companies for services are unfair.

Fourteenth. A holding company lends itself to imposition upon subsidiary operating companies through contracts for purchases of fuel and other supplies from corporations also controlled by the holding company or in which the holding company or some of its officers and directors have an interest. There are instances of where fuel for the operating company cost the operating company more than twice as much as it could have been had in the open market.

Fifteenth. The holding company, through service contracts, is able to require a local operating company to pay $100 a day for the services of men who receive only $20 a day for the services rendered. Such an imposition is effected by having the operating company actually pay the $100 a day to experts performing the service. These experts, employees of the system holding company or its service subsidiary, turn the cash in to their company and receive their contractual wage of $6,000 or $7,000 a year.

Sixteenth. The holding company encourages financial houses as organizers and promoters to create companies and to encourage transactions profitable enough to the financial institutions but without justification in any resulting benefit to the utility companies involved. There are many instances of such organizers taking stocks at prices far below what they would bring on the market.

Seventeenth. The directing holding company at the head of the system frequently makes improvident purchases of operating companies and carries the excessive price paid for operating properties into the consolidated balance sheet. Such improvidence may be due to misguided zeal in extending the sphere of influence of the system or to manipulations incident to cutting down income taxes, or to the belief that an inflated capitalization can be carried into the valuation used as a rate base or to the desire of insiders to profit through a creation of a supply of securities to be thrust upon the speculative public. A startling instance is that of a holding company exchanging $37,000,000 of its stock for $1,000,000 of the stock of an operating company.

A DEVICE TO CREATE SPECIAL PRIVILEGE

The whole country is aroused by this development of holding companies, and State governments stand helpless in the presence of these supercreatures. Whole States are served with power, with gas, with transportation by operating companies in the charge of employees who have no authority, no independence of judgment. They sometimes get good salaries; frequently they do not; and the rank and file of the employees are oftentimes underpaid. The people who complain of the high rates charged or of the quality of the service have to carry their complaints to the men who have no authority to act, who have to get on the telephone or write a letter to New York City, who are subject to removal by those in the top companies without notice, and who are frequently transferred from one part of the country to another. While the employees of these operating companies work without hope of promotion in blind alleys, while the users fret in vain over the prices charged or the quality of the service rendered, a few men in the top holding company enrich themselves and their families and favorites, flaunt their extravagance, and make America a byword in the eyes of our neighboring countries by reason of the extravagance and vulgarity of these privileged people, sheltered by the most amazing legal edifice contrived in the history of mankind.

SMALL INVESTMENT, UNLIMITED POWER

The holding company has developed to where control is exercised through a maze of intercorporate relationships, impossible to be understood by the ordinary man. The holding-company device has been pyramided to give a few small but powerful groups control of the billions of dollars of the public's money invested in the utility industry. This has placed the great utility properties of the country in the control of men who themselves have only a small stake in their real ownership and who have shown neither prudence nor capacity in the management of these properties.

Two thousand companies are not so many to own $20,000,000,000 of property. A company with an average of $20,000,000 is itself a big company. But even those 2,000 companies are not independent. It may surprise you, but about 50 holding companies completely control these 2,000 operating companies. One holding company, Electric Bond & Share, controls so many operating companies that the grand total value of the properties of all of the companies in that system amounts to $3,000,000,000. That is, just one holding company dominates one-seventh of all the property operated by electric-light companies.

WALL STREET CONTROL

And then the banking houses control the holding companies which control the operating companies. One big banking house, through a company called "United Corporation", has an arrangement by which 8 or 10 of these big holding companies are tied together, so that more than one-fourth of the electric-light companies in the entire United States are subject to that banking influence.

The manager of the holding company becomes the big boss for all the electric-light companies which are controlled by the holding company. The controlling figure appoints the presidents and managers of each electric-light company and he tells them what to do. They cannot have any money for improvements without getting it through the master in the far-away city. When the manager of your local electric-light company needs a new dynamo in the power plant, or the money to extend cables in a new addition to your town, he has to take the matter up with the supermanager in a holding company in another city.

This big boss tells him whether or not he can have the money to use in your town, how much can be used, what is to be bought with it, and more importantly, from whom he is to make the purchase, and how much he is to pay. Now, if the top man is interested in a factory manufacturing the machinery your electric-light plant needs, he can make the manager of the company in your home town buy the machinery from the factory belonging to the big boss at the price he fixes. If the big boss in the far-away city charges the electric-light company in your home town more for the machinery than it is worth, nobody knows it. Then when your city council fixes the electric-light rates you shall pay, it has to fix them so that your company can pay the high price for the machinery which the chief of the holding company made it buy. If the holding company controls enough electric-light plants in enough towns and cities, it can, in various ways, make them pay millions of dollars into the holding company.

If you look at the financial structure of one of these holding companies, you will find in many instances that the holding company has outstanding issues of bonds. What is behind those bonds? Not physical properties because the holding company holds merely securities. Behind it is some collection of securities—securities of various subsidiary corporations. In many instances the physical assets of these subsidiaries have been written up deliberately. Then there are classes of preferred stock; then there are classes of common stock, and some classes of common stock will have the privilege and the advantage in voting, thus enabling the management to control the whole structure without assuming any financial risk. A holding company will sell its preferred stock to the public and then without any warning to these stockholders, it will put out ahead of their claim an issue of collateral trust bonds or of pure debentures. The preferred stockholders, even though they may have the privilege of voting, are helpless to prevent the management at its will from putting ahead of them an issue of debentures. The management may take the proceeds from the sale of the debentures and use it in any improvident speculation, even by trying to take the market of its own stock in a highly inflated stock market. And yet companies that indulge in these practices insist that they have the right to live, that they are of benefit to the public, that their activities are essential to the public welfare. They are just as necessary to the public welfare as piracy on the high seas or as robbery on the land. Banditry can be checked by police force, the insidious and subtle swindle through localized manipulation permitted through the laxity of charters of holding companies is more devastating to investors and more burdensome to the customers of operating companies than is the hold-up of a bank by the most hardened thug.

PUBLIC SWINDLED THROUGH DECEIT AND FRAUD

These companies say that there are a few minor abuses. Is a write-up of $2,000,000,000 of physical assets a minor abuse? Is the imposition of rates to make good such write-ups a minor abuse? Is the purchase of operating properties at inflated values and the resale of them through securities to the public at those inflated prices a minor abuse? Is the imposition of hundreds of purchase and sale contracts on as many operating companies, diverting their earnings from their stockholders and even their bondholders, to the people who have no interest in the properties, a minor abuse? Is the persuasion of teachers, of clerks, of professional people, of those with small means in thousands of American communities to buy so-called "preferred stock" of these companies at $60 a share when the managements know that its real value is not more than $5 a share a minor abuse? Is the effort through propaganda to deceive a hundred million people a minor abuse? Is the wholesale lobbying before every city council in this country, before every State legislature, and the effort through means of communications to bring pressure to bear upon the Members of Congress a minor abuse? Is the exchange of the worthless securities of a holding company for the sound bonds and stocks of local operating companies through the high-pressure salesmanship and misrepresentation of the promotional staff of the holding company a minor abuse? Is the swindling of millions of investors to the extent of billions of dollars through stock manipulations of these holding companies a minor abuse? These activities loom as the major activities of the holding companies. They seem to be mills for issuing stocks and bonds to sell to the people and the money of the people thus collected is dissipated as far as the people are concerned in most speculative and improvident exchanges.

INVISIBLE CREATURES OF THE LOOPHOLES IN THE LAW

Now, there are gentlemen who honestly believe that all these abuses can be corrected through some form of regulation. Remember that these companies do not operate anything except their devices for dealing in securities. They are invisible creatures of the law, dealing in intangible claims against various other corporate creatures. They exist as a result of legislative permission. They have grown up like mushrooms in the power industry during the hectic days of a most speculative era. An analysis of their performance fails to disclose justification for their existence.

Much has been said about destruction of value, and I want to say this. If the utility stocks of this country can stand up and be worth anything after 5 months of the people who own them and control them saying they are going to be destroyed, then it appears to me it is idle to say that anybody is going to destroy the value of operating-company stocks.

THE GUILTY OPPOSING THIS BILL

The trouble about this situation is that these holding companies that have fattened off of the investors of this country by the abuses that I have talked to you about are the companies that are fighting this legislation. They are the ones that do not want to die; they are the ones that do not want to be crippled; they are the ones that do not even want to be regulated. [Applause.]

That is what I believe. When they go throughout this land and tell an investor in the securities of a local operating company that this bill or any part of it is going to destroy his value, they are telling him what, in my opinion, is a base falsehood.

BLOODSUCKING HOLDING COMPANIES SHOULD BE DESTROYED

What I want to do is to take from the backs of the clean, honestly operated operating companies of this country these leeches and bloodsucking holding companies, who perform no service, but who are milking to death the local operating companies under their control and are milking to death those who have invested their hard-earned money in the securities of these local operating companies. Do you know this? Over three-fourths of the investor's money in the utility industry is directly invested in securities of the operating companies, not the holding companies. The average investor does not own any stock of a holding company but of an operating company, and a great many investors who bought the stock of a holding company from the agent of the holding company thought they were buying the stock of the operating company in their neighborhood or in a neighboring community or in a neighboring State.

ATTACK ON HOLDING COMPANIES HAS NOT DESTROYED PRICES OF STOCKS

They say that this attack upon utilities has driven stocks down and destroyed their values; that this attack during the Roosevelt administration has robbed the investors of their investments and has brought them to nothing.

Two months ago I asked the Power Commission to give me some figures. I wanted to make a statement about this. I knew that the assertion was not true. I knew that the deflation in these stocks had occurred long before Mr. Roosevelt ever became President of the United States. I formed this into a statement for the newspapers, but I doubt if any of you saw it—I did not.

This is what I said in the statement, and I shall put it all in the RECORD, showing the value of these stocks, how much they have gone down, and when they went down, conclusively demonstrating that the pending holding-company bill did not have this effect, and this was given out more than 2 months ago.

Let me show you what happened:

The tables and charts prepared at my request by the Federal Power Commission and presented at today's hearings conclusively demonstrate that neither the pending holding-company bill nor the policies of the Roosevelt administration are responsible for the losses that have been suffered by the holders of this class of securities. Substantially all the losses in these securities had taken place before Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated and long before the present holding-company bill was drafted.

At my request the Federal Power Commission has computed the market values of all the outstanding securities—bonds, debentures, preferred stocks, and common stocks—of the 25 principal electric-utility holding companies at the height of the market of 1929, at the end of February 1933, just before the present administration came into power, and at the present time. These computations are based upon the actual bid or sales price as published in authoritative financial journals.

They show that in 1929 these 25 holding companies had securities outstanding in the hands of the public with a nominal market value of $19,245,157,757. This enormous volume of securities had been issued by these 25 holding companies alone, although the total claimed fixed capital of the entire electric light and power industry was at that time less than $12,000,000,000. This is an indication of the unconscionable inflation of the holding-company securities during the stock-market boom.

Now, remember these stocks had a nominal market value in 1929 of more than $19,000,000,000. By the end of February 1933, just before the present administration came into office, these securities had declined to a market value of $2,879,000,000.

In other words, for every dollar they went down after March 1933 they went down the preceding 4 years $27, and I am informed from sources that I rely upon that these stocks have regained all that they have lost; and yet this gain has been made in the face of assertion from operating companies, as well as holding companies, that they are going to be destroyed, not only the holding companies, but the operating companies as well.

This represents a shrinkage of more than $16,000,000,000 in the value of the securities of these 25 holding companies before Franklin D. Roosevelt became President. It represented a loss of 85 percent of their market value at the height of the boom period.

Since March 1, 1933, these same securities of the 25 holding companies have suffered a further decline of $594,018,970. This is a large sum, but it pales into insignificance in comparison with the $16,000,000,000 loss during the preceding years of the depression.

Reduced to the simplest terms, these figures demonstrate that for every dollar that has been lost in holding-company securities since Roosevelt became President $27 were lost before he was inaugurated.

The facts become even more significant when we consider separately the debentures and preferred stocks of the holding companies, which have more or less value behind them, and the common stocks, which are largely "water." The bonds and debentures of these 25 holding companies, which had a market value of $726,788,792 in 1929, declined 53 percent by the end of February 1933, but since that time they have increased 23 percent. This represents a gain of more than $77,000,000. The preferred stocks of these holding companies, which had a market value of $1,730,807,818 in 1929, declined 58 percent before the 1st of March 1933, but have increased $9,058,000 in the two succeeding years. Thus the total gain in market value of these holding-company debentures and preferred stocks during the present administration has been more than $86,000,000.

The common stocks of these 25 holding companies had a market value in 1929 of $16,787,563,147. This is an amount practically equal to the public debt of the United States at that time. From this high point the market value of these holding-company common stocks declined 89 percent before the present administration assumed office in March 1933. Since that time, during the period when the Roosevelt policies have been in effect, the decline has been only 4 percent.

These figures are so enormous that they are difficult for the average man to grasp. The point will probably be made clearer if we get down to values that are more nearly within his experience. For example, 10 shares of common stock of the American Gas & Electric Co. at the height of the 1929 boom had a market value on the New York Curb of $2,038.75. On February 28, 1933, just before Roosevelt became President, they had declined to $210. But on April 9, 1935, in the face of all the depressing holding company propaganda against this bill, they had a value of $247.50, a gain of $37.50.

Ten shares of Commonwealth & Southern common, which were run up to a market value of $320 in 1929, were worth only $18.75 when Roosevelt was inaugurated—a loss of more than $300. Since March 1, 1933, they have declined only $5.

Ten shares of the common stock of Middle West Utilities—the Insull empire—were inflated by pool operations to a market price of $500 in 1929. By the 1st of March 1933 this fictitious empire had collapsed and 10 shares were worth $1.25. Now they can be sold at exactly the same price.

Ten shares of the North American Co. common stock had a market price at the height of the 1929 boom of $1,868.75. Before Roosevelt took office and 2 years before the holding company bill was drafted these shares had declined to $187.50. This represented a loss of $1,681.25 to the "innocent investors" who bought at the top of the market. At this time—April 9, 1935—in spite of the depressing propaganda that has been put out by the North American Co. and others against this bill, the 10 shares have a sale price of $132.50. This represents a decline of only $55 during the present administration.

Ten shares of Stone & Webster common which sold as high as $1,133.75 in 1929 had declined to $62.50 before March 1, 1933. Now they would sell for $40.

These examples could be multiplied indefinitely. They would all tell the same story: That the greater part of the losses which investors and speculators in holding-company securities have suffered occurred before the Roosevelt administration assumed office and long before the present holding-company bill was drafted. The shrinkage in the price of holding-company securities has been due to a recognition by the investing public that they have never had any solid value behind them but were flimsy paper structures built up by promoters and speculators.

Much misleading propaganda regarding the alleged destructive effects of the pending bill upon operating companies has also been distributed since its introduction on February 6. Examination of the stock-market prices of leading operating-company common stocks indicates that this propaganda has failed in its obvious purpose of intimidating investors in these securities. Comparing present prices (Apr. 9, 1935) with the high prices reached during the week before the introduction of the holding-company bill, shows the following advances: Boston Edison $18.25 per share; Cleveland Electric $2.25 per share; Commonwealth Edison $9 per share; Consolidated Gas & Electric of Baltimore $5.62½ per share; Hartford Electric $5.50 per share.

Detroit Edison common has declined $5.62½ per share since the introduction of the bill; but this would appear to be due to anticipation of the normal seasonal decline in the production of automobiles, which is Detroit's chief power consuming industry.

It is obvious, therefore, that the investing public, having recovered from the first shock of the misleading and depressing propaganda circulated by the holding companies after the pending bill was introduced, have regained their confidence and are relying upon the Congress to enact legislation which will protect their interests and remove from this industry the abuses which have hitherto threatened every legitimate investment.

These things, of course, declined 89 percent, because there was not any value behind them then and never was, in most instances, as to these common stocks.

I will say this, if the bill I introduced on the 6th day of February were passed, the exchange of stocks or the value of any stocks would remain for whatever value it had. [Applause.]

THIS BILL FAIR TO SECURITY HOLDERS

I believe any bill which the Congress will pass will provide for equitable arrangements fair to all security owners, even where the company relationships are most mixed, intertwined, and confused. I want to call your attention to the fact that the owners of these stocks of holding companies have not been any too well cared for under our present lack of Federal legislation. For example, the low price for the common stock of American Power & Light Co. in December 1929 was 68⅞, in December 1934 it was 3. Low price for the common stock of Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation in December 1929 was 62¼, in December 1934 it was 6⅝. Low price for common stock of Commonwealth & Southern in December 1929 was 11¾ and in December 1934 it was 1. Low price for the common stock of Stone & Webster, Inc., in December 1929 was 72½ and in December 1934 it was 3⅞. From these quotations from the market you can see that the stocks of power and gas holding companies, as a class, have ceased to be very attractive even to speculators. As you recognize, I have given quotations from some of the holding companies which are among the best managed. Insull has long ago crashed altogether.

Now, these holding companies came before us and had 48 hours in which to testify. They used these 48 hours in giving the committee some information, but the greater part of their time was used up telling how good they were and what great service they had rendered the country through services, but said little about charging fees, and so forth, to the operating companies.

There is a peculiar thing about that. They formed a committee, when we told them they could have ample time to appear before the committee, to distribute that time among the various holding-company groups.

That committee of three, headed by Mr. Gadsden, from whom you have received many gracious letters, refused to allow the Associated Gas & Electric Co. to come in on their time. They refused to allow the Cities Service to come in on their time, because, I presume, they did not want to be seen on the same side of the street with them. [Laughter.]

But after these gentlemen closed their hearing the committee said, "We ought to hear the Associated Gas & Electric Co. and we ought to hear the Cities Service Co."

So they came in. Of course, Mr. Hopson did not come down for the Associated Gas & Electric Co., and neither did Mr. Doherty appear for the Cities Service Co., but they sent some fine-looking, courteous gentlemen, and I am sure they are gentlemen.

When they got through their testimony, having been outlawed by those gentlemen who had refused to associate with them, they told how good they were, and the Cities Service said: "We are this much better than the other fellows, for we are the only company that is not banker-controlled; we are controlled by the public."

I do not know whether they are controlled by the public or not, but the public has been well bitten by them.

Examples of objectionable practices of holding companies were recited in testimony before the committee. The page references contained herein are to the record of the testimony made by witnesses appearing for the Government.

A generalized description of holding-company operations is given somewhat as follows: A holding company acquires a number of operating properties. It then organizes a new company or companies to which the properties are conveyed at a figure far in excess of what the holding company paid. The property accounts of the new operating company reflect the excessive price paid. The new company pays for the properties transferred to it by delivering bonds, preferred stock, and common stock to the holding company. The holding company proceeds to sell the bonds and preferred stock, usually for enough to recover a large part, if not all, of its original investment in the properties. The holding company retains the common stock, and hence the control of the new operating company (p. 173). It may then resort to various devices to exact as much revenue as possible from the operating company for its own profit and to support its own inflated capitalization.

WRITE-UPS

Examples of write-ups are very numerous.

The Electric Power & Light Corporation, organized in 1925 as a subsidiary of the Electric Bond & Share group, acquired properties of operating companies in Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi, which were turned over to three new companies. These properties were bought by the new companies for $70,520,000, which was $27,761,740 more than the recorded valuation on the books of the predecessor companies (pp. 160–161).

Another write-up occurred when the Appalachian Electric Power Co. was organized. This company took over properties which had been acquired prior to 1926 by the American Gas & Electric Co. The properties stood on the books of the predecessor companies at about $72,000,000. When transferred to the Appalachian Electric Power Co., a subsidiary of American Gas & Electric, they were immediately put on the books at $139,039,648, an increase of $66,418,192 (p. 165).

In 1923 and 1924 certain electric utilities in Minnesota owned by the American Power & Light Co. were consolidated and merged into the Minnesota Power & Light Co. The ledger value of these properties, together with the cost of certain new construction, was approximately $17,076,250. This property was entered on the books of the Minnesota Power & Light Corporation at $38,711,179, a write-up of at least $21,634,929, or 126 percent (p. 210).

When the American Power & Light Co. got title to various properties in Florida, their ledger value, together with the cost of additional construction, was $28,231,209. The properties were conveyed to the Florida Power & Light Co. and entered on the books at $58,445,217, a write-up of $30,232,008, or 103 percent (p. 214).

In 1911 Electric Bond & Share Co. purchased the properties of the Waco Electric & Gas Co., Waxahachie Electric & Gas Co., Cleburne Electric & Gas Co., Hillsboro Electric & Gas Co., Sherman Electric & Gas Co., Bonham Electric & Gas Co., and Temple Light & Power Co. for a total consideration of $2,390,000.

On May 25, 1912, these properties were conveyed to the newly organized Texas Power & Light Co. for bonds and stocks with a total par value of $10,500,000. Thus, there was a write-up on the books of that company of $8,160,000, or over 400 percent.

In 1924 Henry L. Doherty & Co. organized the Cities Service Power & Light Co. to take over securities owned by the Cities Service Co. The assets were recorded on the books of the new company at $106,104,403, or 165 percent more than the $40,067,952 at which they were carried on the books of Cities Service Co. This was a write-up of $66,046,551 (p. 260).

Write-ups of operating companies in the Associated Gas & Electric system were $115,000,000. Write-ups of particular companies in the group were as follows:

New York State Electric & Gas Corporation	$10,021,634
Staten Island Edison Corporation	3,222,692
Erie Lighting Co	1,788,735
Johnstown Fuel Supply Co	1,078,707
Pennsylvania Electric Co	17,284,354
Clarion River Power Co	5,136,765
Broad River Power Co	13,238,898
Metropolitan Edison Co	25,857,408

The United Gas & Improvement Co. system showed write-ups of $10,290,000 in the operating companies, and $13,900,000 in sub holding companies, but none in the top holding company (p. 301).

Write-ups of operating companies as shown by the Federal Trade Commission were $93,000,000 in the American Power & Light group, $62,000,000 in the Electric Power & Light group, and $47,000,000 in the National Power & Light group (pp. 171 and 227). Write-ups of $134,000,000 were found on the books of operating companies in the Cities Service Co. (p. 240), and not all of the companies were examined (p. 283).

The Federal Trade Commission found the total write-ups in 18 holding company systems to be as follows: $273,000,000 in top holding companies, $350,000,000 in sub holding companies, and $839,000,000 in operating companies, and not all operating companies were examined (p. 250). Total write-ups for 18 holding-company systems were about $1,500,000,000 (p. 285). In 91 operating companies examined by the Federal Trade Commission the write-ups were about 22 percent of the fixed capital (p. 297).

Write-ups were sometimes made on the basis of appraisals, sometimes not. When made on the basis of appraisals they were frequently superficial and often by interested parties. The purpose of the write-ups in most cases was to allow the holding company to get back what it had invested and still control the properties (p. 215). Conservative accounting practice does not favor write-ups even when based on careful and independent appraisals.

CAPITALIZATION OF WRITE-UPS

The write-ups, such as those described, were usually capitalized; that is, they were accompanied by corresponding increases in security issues. In fact, the writing-up of values was usually done for the purpose of enabling a larger volume of securities to be issued in order that the holding company which received the securities might dispose of them and recover a large part of its initial investment.

There are a number of instances, however, in which the write-up in book value was not capitalized but was used to create an artificial surplus, or a depreciation reserve. The Northern States Power Co. about 1924 wrote up the value of its property by $15,000,000. On the liability side of the balance sheet it set up a "capital surplus" of $8,000,000 and a reserve depreciation of $7,000,000. The latter item would lead one to believe that the company had established out of earnings a retirement reserve to take care of property as it went out of service. Against the capital surplus was charged a discount on bonds of over $8,000,000, thereby eliminating the discount and relieving the earnings statement each year of the annual charge normally made to amortize the discount on bonds (pp. 140 and 141). A write-up of $3,000,000 on the books of the Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. was carried to surplus and then used to get unamortized bond discount off the books (p. 296).

CONTROL WITH BUT LITTLE INVESTMENT

The purpose of write-ups and their capitalization is to enable the holding companies to recover a large part or all of their investment in operating companies—or other holding companies—and still retain control and share in the profits.

When the Nebraska Power Co. took over the properties formerly belonging to the Omaha Electric Light & Power Co. it paid $10,499,500 for properties which had cost the American Power & Light Corporation, a holding company in the Electric Bond & Share group, only $5,800,000. The Nebraska Power Co. issued $1,500,000 of 10-year notes, $3,000,000 of preferred stock, and $4,999,500 of common stock in payment for the properties. The notes and preferred stock were disposed of by the American Power & Light Corporation for $5,112,820, leaving it in control of the new company with a very small investment. If previous profits to Electric Bond & Share from transferring these properties are taken into consideration, the common stock cost the Electric Bond & Share less than nothing (p. 162).

When the American Gas & Electric Co. conveyed properties to its subsidiary, the Appalachian Electric Power Co., in 1926, it received securities in the amount of $112,129,000 for properties which had cost it $62,600,000. The American Gas & Electric sold the bonds and preferred stock and thereby recovered most of its investment, still holding the common stock. If other details of the transaction are taken into consideration, it appears that the American Gas & Electric Co. recovered all of its initial investment and a profit of $1,200,000, and still held the common stock. In other words, the common stock cost it less than nothing (p. 165).

When the Cities Service Co. sold its stock holdings in 1924 to Cities Service Power & Light Co., it received $99,999,000 in securities of the latter for securities which had cost it about $40,000,000. It then disposed of a large part of the securities of the Cities Service Power & Light Co., reducing its investment of $40,000,000 to less than $5,000,000 (p. 260).

In 1924 Cities Service Co. purchased stock of the Colorado Power Co., and later transferred to it a subsidiary, the Public Service Co. of Colorado, for $5,987,051 more than it cost. It received payment in securities of the Public Service Co. of Colorado, and sold part of them for more than it had paid for the stock delivered, retaining $5,500,000 of common stock of the Public Service Co. of Colorado, which cost it less than nothing (p. 240).

The Lakeside Construction Co., which built a plant for the Public Service Co. of Colorado, for which it received $10,000,000 of securities, and it more than defrayed the construction cost from the sale of $6,000,000 in bonds and preferred stock which had been issued to it in payment for the construction. It retained $2,500,000 of common stock which cost it nothing. The construction company and the Public Service Co. of Colorado were both controlled by the Cities Service Co. (p. 174).

"MILKING" THE OPERATING COMPANIES

In order to support their own inflated capitalization and earn profits for themselves and the holding companies higher up in the series, the holding companies have resorted to various devices to extort the largest possible amount of revenue from the operating companies. Sometimes this is merely an attempt to keep the rates of the operating companies high enough to earn a return on their inflated book value, thereby keeping up a flow of earnings to the holding company in the form of dividends on stock held by the holding company. In some cases this has led to carrying on the books of the operating company property that has long since been retired. Property of this sort to the extent of $30,000,000 was found on the books of the Twin State Gas & Electric Co. (p. 220). In other cases depreciation is not provided for as it should be. This was true of operating companies in the Insull system (p. 220).

But holding companies have resorted to other devices to extort large sums from operating companies. Many of these practices justify the charge that the holding-company system "is to a degree more or less of a parasite and excrescence on the actual operating companies of the country" (p. 122). The more common devices may be noted.

MANAGEMENT AND OTHER FEES

A common practice of holding companies is to charge management fees for their services to operating companies. There is little objection to such fees, if they are reasonable in amount and only remunerate the holding companies for actual and necessary expense of managing the properties. These fees are not based on competitive bidding. There is no "arm's length" bargaining, as the holding company which renders the service is in control of the company which pays for the service. These payments are described as "a disguised dividend that comes out ahead of even the interest on the bonds of the corporation" (p. 144).

In 1927 the Electric Bond & Share Co. received from the operating companies supervised by it the sum of $9,373,172.07 as fees for performing services. The total expenses incurred by the Electric Bond & Share Co. in rendering these services was $4,403,722.17. This gave a profit to Electric Bond & Share Co. of $4,969,449.30. The rate of profit was 113 percent.

In the year 1931 Electric Bond & Share Co. received $11,248,273.17 as income for rendering management services to its subsidiary operating companies. This year the rate of profit was 103 percent.

The Associated Gas & Electric Co. charged management fees to its operating companies. Then the actual cost of the management services was carried in a fund known as the "Ithaca working fund", which was apportioned among the operating companies. Thus the operating companies paid the expense of the management services in addition to the management fees (p. 160).

In 1926 the subsidiary companies of the Associated Gas & Electric system were caused to enter into management contracts with the Associated Gas & Electric Co. These contracts were then assigned to another subsidiary called "Utility Management Corporation", in return for securities capitalized with a stated value of $5,200,000. The Utility Management Corporation thereafter received fees at the rate of 2½ percent of the gross revenue of the operating companies. In the year 1927 it received the sum of $420,114.88, and in the year 1928 it received $338,087.89. However, Utility Management Corporation did not itself render any managerial services. After it had received the contracts from the Associated Gas & Electric Co., it in turn employed the J. G. White Management Corporation, not then an affiliated company, to perform the actual services, and paid to the J. G. White Management Corporation the sum of $200,000 a year. Since the White Co. was not an affiliated company, it is to be presumed that it, in turn, made a profit on the managerial services it was paid to perform.

In one instance the sub holding companies in the Central Public Service group received management fees of $1,246,000 for which they rendered no service (p. 231).

Legal fees were sometimes exacted of operating companies which went to swell the earnings of the holding company. Thus the Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation, controlled by Standard Gas & Electric Co., collected fees for legal services performed by an affiliated legal firm, the profits of which went to the Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation. The lawyers were paid on a salary or a commission basis. In 11 years, from 1919 to 1929, the management corporation collected from operating subsidiaries in the Standard Gas & Electric Co., for legal services, $3,359,884. After deducting the expenses of the legal department they realized a net profit of $2,078,872 out of the arrangement (pp. 300–301).

Management and other fees are ordinarily charged directly to the operating expenses of the operating companies. In some instances they are charged to property accounts and become an element on which a return is to be allowed. This is particularly true of construction fees. Thus Electric Bond & Share had many contracts for supervising construction activities of subsidiaries, and received 5 percent of the cost of construction. This amount was charged to the property account of the operating company (p. 168). Fees charged by the Northern States Power Co. of Minnesota by the Byllesby Engineering & Management Corporation were charged, in part, by the Northern States Power Co. of Minnesota to its fixed property account. On August 31, 1934, the amount which had so been charged was $4,600,000 (p. 141).

In some instances the holding companies have not been content with the flow of earnings resulting from the management fees, but have capitalized the management contracts, by carrying them into the asset accounts of the servicing companies. The Associated Gas & Electric Co. did this. It caused the Consumers' Construction Co., one of these servicing companies, to set up its contracts at $5,500,000. It caused the Utilities Purchasing & Supply Corporation to set up on its books the contracts to act as purchasing agent to the operating companies at $3,700,000. The Associated Utilities Merchandising Co. set up the contract by which it had the right to sell appliances at $5,900,000. The total of such contracts carried into the asset accounts by the various servicing companies was about $28,000,000 (pp. 126–127).

HIGH INTEREST ON ADVANCES TO OPERATING COMPANIES

Holding companies frequently charge high rates of interest on advances to operating companies.

PROFITS ON THE SALE OF APPLIANCES

For a great many years the subsidiaries of the Associated Gas & Electric Co. turned all of their money into the Associated Gas & Electric Co., and in general could not draw it out unless the Associated countersigned their checks. The subsidiaries were then charged interest at the rate of 8 percent per annum, compounded monthly, on such advances made by the Associated Gas & Electric (pp. 150–151).

Operating companies in the Associated Gas & Electric system were required to sell electrical appliances. The operating companies provided the bookkeeping, the light, the rent, the clerks, the salesmen, and got absolutely nothing for it, as all the profits were taken by an appliance company controlled by the Associated Gas & Electric Corporation. After the Federal Trade Commission investigation, a change was made so that the operating companies would get something out of it (p. 152).

FICTITIOUS TAXES LEVIED ON OPERATING COMPANIES

The Associated Gas & Electric Co. was permitted for a long time to make consolidated income-tax returns. From 1926 to 1929 it paid no income taxes to the United States Government, but collected for income taxes from its subsidiaries the sum of $2,900,000, which passed into its own income account, although charged by the operating company as taxes (p. 153). These taxes were estimated for each month and were treated as advances to the operating company. The operating companies were charged interest on these amounts at the rate of 8 percent per year, compounded monthly.

The New England Gas & Electric Association, controlled by the same persons who controlled Associated Gas & Electric, used the same device, and in 1927, 1928, and 1929 received $514,000 income from taxes paid by subsidiaries (p. 154).

The Cities Service Co. adopted this device, and from 1922 to 1930 collected $11,611,601.35 from subsidiaries as taxes, paid $1,743,220.98 to the United States Government, and pocketed $9,866,380.87 (p. 154). The right to make consolidated income-tax returns has recently been taken away.

INSIDE CONSTRUCTION COMPANIES

The Colorado Public Service Co. paid $10,000,000 for the construction of an electric station at Valmont, outside of Denver. The construction was done by the Lakeside Construction Co., which, like the Colorado Public Service Co., was controlled by the Cities Service Co. The cost of the station was around $4,400,000. The Lakeside Construction Co. sold part of the $10,000,000 in securities for $6,600,000 and retained the remainder (p. 174).

UPSTREAM LOANS

Operating companies have often been called upon to help the holding companies out of financial difficulties. Loans by operating companies to holding companies are sometimes called "upstream loans."

The Metropolitan Edison Co. bonded itself for an extra $9,000,000 in order to purchase bonds of a holding company in the same group (p. 155). When the depression came along, many of the operating companies in the Insull group were bonded and the money used in an attempt to save the holding companies (p. 315). (No specific instances are cited.)

I want to give you a brief picture of title I of the committee substitute bill—the part known as the Public-Utility Holding Company Act, and regulating holding companies of gas or electric operating utilities. All the regulatory and administrative powers and duties under this title are vested in the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the use of the word "Commission" throughout the title means that Commission.

Title I of this bill, insofar as it is based upon the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, reaches only those utility holding companies which are actively interstate holding companies—interstate in their use of the channels of interstate commerce to transmit energy, to transport gas, to carry on their business with subsidiaries in many States, to sell and ship goods, to distribute their securities to the public, and so on. Sometimes several of these interstate activities are being carried on continuously; sometimes all of them. But unless a holding company is thus vitally a part of the great interstate commerce of this country, it is not reached by this bill as a subject of Federal regulation.

At the outset, in section 1, the bill states the basis of Federal jurisdiction over public-utility holding companies which operate in interstate commerce or whose practices directly affect or burden interstate commerce. The section also states the policy of Congress in enacting title I to be that of controlling the abuses and eliminating the evils connected with public-utility holding companies. In a moment I shall discuss certain of those evils and point out how particular provisions of the bill are designed to curb and cure them.

The bill in section 2 defines 27 terms. These definitions are for the sole purpose of clarity and exactness—none of them imposes any duty or liability on any person or company. They are put in the bill merely to make the substantive provisions of the bill easy to understand and do not carry with them any liabilities or restrictions. To be a holding company within the definition means nothing in and of itself; nor does any obligation arise from the definitions of subsidiary company or affiliate, and so forth.

The definition of holding company, which in substance is a company which controls operating gas or electric utilities, becomes important only in light of the provisions in the other sections of the bill; and in section 4 it is expressly provided that if a company is a holding company and if it makes certain specified uses of interstate commerce or of the mails to carry on its business of controlling utilities and to sell and distribute its securities to the public, then it must register with the Securities Commission in order to remain entitled to the privilege of carrying on its business in interstate commerce. From then on each provision of title I applicable to holding companies is directed only to registered holding companies—that is, those that are essentially interstate in their business activities and required by section 4 to register. They become registered companies by filing their registration statements and following the procedure prescribed in section 5.

But even though a company is an interstate holding company and uses the mails to carry on its business, still it may be exempted from any provision of the bill if it falls within one of the five categories of companies which section 3 directs the Commission to exempt, except insofar as the Commission makes a finding that the exemption would be definitely detrimental to the public interest or the interest of investors or consumers. These five classes of holding companies which can qualify for exemption under section 3 are classes of companies which, although actually holding companies by virtue of their having control over operating utilities, are, nevertheless, not the kind of holding company set-up which it is intended to reach in title I. These five exempted classes are:

First. Essentially intrastate systems where both the holding company and its utility subsidiaries are organized in the same State, and where their business is substantially confined to that State;

Second. Systems in which the holding company is primarily itself an operating company, whose operations do not extend beyond the State where it is organized and contiguous States;

Third. Systems in which the holding company is only incidentally in the utility field, being primarily engaged in nonutility businesses;

Fourth. Systems in which the holding company is temporarily a holding company, being one solely because it holds securities of operating companies in order to liquidate a debt or for underwriting purposes; and Fifth. Systems in which there are no domestic utilities but rather only utilities outside the United States.

Now, if a company is an interstate holding company with operating utilities in several States, and if it does not fall in one of the five classes of exempted companies which I have listed, it is the sort of national utility-holding company which is of particular concern to the Federal Government and it must register under section 4, and be regulated by the rest of the provisions of title I for the protection of the public, of investors, and of consumers.

The substantive provisions of title I are directed at the regulation and simplification of registered holding companies and their subsidiaries. Unless a holding company is registered neither it nor its subsidiaries are reached under the provisions in the bill. And these provisions of the bill can be divided into six fairly well-defined classes, regulating:

First. Issue and sale of securities (secs. 6 and 7);

Second. Acquisition of securities, utility plants, and interests in other businesses (secs. 8, 9, and 10);

Third. Intercompany transactions (sec. 12);

Fourth. Service contracts (sec. 13);

Fifth. Simplification of holding company systems (sec. 11); and Sixth. Reports and accounts (secs. 14 and 15).

I would like to explain these six classes of provisions briefly and show how they reach particular evils.

First. Issue of securities: The Securities Commission is directed to examine future issues of securities by registered companies and such of their subsidiary operating companies as do not have their security issues regulated by State commissions. Section 6 requires each new issue of such companies to follow a procedure of a declaration filed with the Commission setting forth the facts in connection with the issue. There are exempted in section 6 certain classes of issues, such as short-term financing and issues pursuant to presently outstanding securities. Section 7 outlines the procedure to be followed, and sets up the requirements which must be met in new security issues. It directs the Commission to stop any issue which fails to meet those requirements. The requirements are directed at such things as overcapitalization, unfair distribution of voting power, unnecessary complexities in financial structure, improper fees and commissions, and so forth.

Probably most important under this regulation of security issues will be the prevention of the issue of securities on the basis of write-ups; securities which in the past have been sold to the public with nothing behind them except fictitious values created out of wind and water. The provisions will also prevent the issue of various kinds and classes of securities with unequal voting power; a device for financial pyramiding so that control could be concentrated in the hands of a few insiders who did not put up money of their own. These sections are also designed to prevent in great measure the sale to the public in the form of gilt edge, senior securities, things that really constitute only an interest in the common stock equities of subsidiary companies, while the prohibitions in this regard are not as carefully safeguarded as the corresponding restrictions in the Senate bill, they do go great lengths in protecting the public against the practice of dressing up common stocks in the form of bonds and debentures. I should like to see these provisions made more adequate and more effective.

Second. Acquisition of securities and utility plants: Section 9 subjects future acquisitions of securities, utility plants, and other interests to the approval by the Securities Exchange Commission. There are exempted from the requirement of Commission approval such transactions as the acquisition of securities for investment, the acquisition of commercial paper and other securities in the usual course of business, and the acquisition by utility companies of the plant or securities of another utility in the same State if approved by a State commission, and so forth. Section 10 outlines the procedure for obtaining Commission approval and sets forth the requirements which must be met before the Commission may approve an acquisition. These requirements are directed toward the prevention of interlocking relationships or the concentration of control of public utilities to an extent detrimental to the public interest, the paying of exorbitant fees and commissions, the creating of undue complexities in capital structure, etc. In the case of acquisitions of utility securities or utility plants, the acquisition must meet the requirement of tending toward the economical and efficient development of an integrated utility system. Section 8 prohibits in the future two types of acquisitions of utility plants and securities. This section prohibits acquisitions bringing foreign utilities into domestic systems unless the foreign properties can be integrated with the domestic properties. It also prohibits acquisitions in contravention of State policy against the common ownership of competing gas and electric utilities.

These provisions will safeguard acquisitions in the future so that unfair prices will not be paid to corporate insiders—with the public furnishing the money and then holding the bag when it is discovered that the properties cannot possibly earn their carrying charges. Taken together with the provisions governing security issues, these sections will curb the practice which holding company financiers have indulged in of burdening the system with such large debts, and such a watered-stock structure that there was an ever-pressing need to exact more and heavier fees from the operating companies and hence to charge as much as, and in many cases more than, the consumer could bear. While these sections are not as specific in their limitations on future acquisitions, particularly in the matter of engaging in speculative, nonutility enterprises, as the provisions of the Senate bill, they should go a long way toward preventing the wanton waste of the investors' and the consumers' money.

Third. Intercompany transactions: Section 12 vests in the Securities and Exchange Commission the power to make rules along certain specified lines governing intercompany transactions in the systems of registered holding companies, such as loans, fees, commissions, and so forth. It also subjects to the control of the Commission's rules and regulations the disposition of assets, the payment of dividends, the redemption or retirement of securities, and the obtaining of proxies. Except for the prohibition in this section against "upstream loans", the regulation is a matter of the exercise of the Commission's discretion through rules setting up safeguards for these transactions by registered companies and their subsidiaries.

These provisions will reach a wide range of practices—all of which have been a frequent source of injury to the public by reason of the fact that the holding company sits on both sides of the transaction and dictates its terms—often with flagrant disregard of the best interests of investors and consumers. Thus it will be possible to prevent the siphoning off of money from operating companies to finance the speculative ventures of the bankers and others in control of the system. The operating companies will be protected against having their reserves depleted whether through loans or excessive dividends. This exaction of excessive dividends has in the past frequently been even more harmful, because more subtle, than the taking of upstream loans. Furthermore, when the operating company borrows funds from the holding company it will be possible to prevent the charging of excessive interest and unearned bonuses. The Commission is given power to prescribe rules which will safeguard against the transfer of assets and securities from one company to another in the system in such a way as to create paper costs and fictitious gains and losses.

Fourth. Service contracts: Section 13 requires service, sales, and construction contracts, if they are to be performed from inside the system for companies in the system, to be performed in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Securities Commission to provide a certain amount of protection for subsidiary companies which are served by a company controlled by the same holding company. The section prohibits the holding company from performing the services itself, but it may act in the future through a controlled service, management, or construction company, whose transactions will be subject to the Commission's rules under this section. The performance of service contracts by persons whose principal business is the performance of such contracts for utilities, is also subjected in section 13 to the rule-making power of the Commission. Personally, I preferred the original section of the bill.

Fifth. Simplification of holding company systems: Section 11 outlines the duties of the Commission regarding voluntary and compulsory simplification of holding company systems. Under the compulsory feature, the Securities Commission is directed to issue its orders, at any time after January 1, 1938, to registered holding companies and their subsidiaries so as to require the limitation of holding company properties to those comprising one or more integrated public-utility systems. The question of the extent and scope of holding company systems in the future and whether they are to be allowed to retain 1, 2, 4, or more integrated systems is made a matter of the Commission's exercise of its discretion with due regard for the public interest. And the Commission may not require any divestment of nonutility businesses unless it affirmatively finds that such business cannot be retained consistently with the public interest. Nor may the Commission require under section 11 the divestment of any foreign properties now held. The Commission may also issue its orders for simplification upon application by the companies in the system involved whenever they request such an order. There are also provisions in section 11 subjecting to the Commission's rules and regulations the soliciting of proxies in connection with reorganization plans. This will afford a much-needed protection to the investor—he will be able to consider concrete proposals on their merits and receive a full and fair disclosure of all material facts before he is forced to tie himself irrevocably to a plan which might be injurious to his interests and involve great expense on his part.

Sixth. Reports and accounts: Section 14 requires regular reports by registered holding companies to the Commission regarding the financial condition of the company and its subsidiary companies and the transactions and relations between them. Section 15 vests in the Commission power to prescribe methods of accounting for registered holding companies and their subsidiaries. It also gives the Commission power to prescribe the accounts of affiliates and persons whose principal business is the performance of service contracts for utilities, insofar as the transactions of affiliates and such persons are subject to the title. These sections will put an end to the elusive practice indulged in by holding companies, who for years have obstructed effective State regulation of their operating subsidiaries by the simple device of keeping important information and books outside the State, beyond the reach of local regulatory commissions. Such information will now be on file with the Securities Commission or will be available through that Commission. Furthermore, after the Commission has prescribed uniform systems of accounting, the books and accounts when obtained will be in such form as to reveal rather than conceal the true nature and effect of transactions and the exact financial status of the companies.

The remaining provisions of the title are concerned with such matters as the liability for false and misleading statements (section 16), reports by officers and directors of transactions in the securities of their companies (section 17), and the administrative provisions covering such matters as hearings, the rule-making power of the Commission, investigations, enforcement, penalties, and so forth.

I want to say this: I appreciate the candor and cooperation of the 26 other members of this committee who have patriotically, along with the chairman, tried to work out this tremendous problem.

I want to add in closing that today and yesterday we received from Texas a great protest against title II of this bill, which the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] will discuss with you, because he was chairman of that subcommittee—a protest against title II as taking away from Texas its right to control its own affairs, when there is no utility commission to control. Some of the same gentlemen who do me the honor to listen from the gallery today have been the instrumentalities throughout the years of defeating in the Texas Legislature the passage of any effective utility legislation. They confess to be for utility regulation in Texas but always make proposals that no considerable number of legislators are for, and the final outcome no law. [Applause.] Yet they have their friends in Texas today wiring Members of Congress from Texas that they are, by the passage of this bill, arranging to take away from Texas some of its power and some of its prerogatives.

NO PROPER REGULATIONS OF UTILITIES IN TEXAS

Do you know the only regulation of utilities we have in Texas? The holding companies, the big operating companies, go to the town commission, for instance, in a town, and those great experts argue rates with the mayor and two commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Under Peter Molyneaux in Texas they have been broadcasting against this bill. They called in a man by the name of J. J. Taylor, known as the "State press", an editorial writer on the Dallas News, a man of high character, a man of honor, a man of truthfulness. But the propaganda has gone around in Texas that this committee knew nothing about this bill; that the chairman never saw the bill until it was handed to him. They have gone into my town, the agents of these companies, and asked the people to send letters to me and telegrams and petitions to me and to other Members of the Texas delegation and its Senators, by telling them, "SAM RAYBURN does not care anything about this bill. It does not make any difference with him. Just let him know that you do not want it and perhaps he will kill it."

Mr. MOLYNEAUX. You grant perfect sincerity to the President; therefore I take it that you grant as much to Mr. RAYBURN, one of the authors of the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR. Precisely. Mr. RAYBURN has long served in Congress from Texas. He is chairman of one of the most important committees in the lower House. But my view is that Mr. RAYBURN attached his name to the measure by request, direct or implied, and that he would not be inconsolable if the bill failed of passage.

That statement is not only false, it is infamous. It imputes to me motives that are low. Mr. Taylor is a gentleman and a truthful man, but these utilities have spread this propaganda throughout Texas, and Mr. Taylor is simply echoing it without any information upon it, but I say this to Mr. Taylor, that before he imputes motives to anyone he should investigate the facts if he expects to continue to be classed as an honest and truthful man. In trying to get people to sign letters and telegrams to me and the Senators and other Representatives from Texas, agents of these companies have gone from town to town circulating this and other infamous falsehoods.

Our committee was investigating, under Dr. Splawn, as I stated here, one of the ablest men who has ever served this or any other Government, before any of this "brain trust" was ever heard of. The Federal Trade Commission for 5 years, with an expenditure of $2,000,000, was investigating this matter. I sat with the President and with representatives of the Government, and with representatives of the Federal Trade Commission and with Dr. Splawn and others, before this bill was ever brought into existence, and I had to do with its writing.

SPRAWLING EMPIRES AND GLORIFIED OFFICE BOYS

Let me say this, and then I am done: These gigantic holding companies spread throughout the land. This Electric Bond & Share is one of the sprawling empires with properties operating in 32 States. Those managers, those directors, those presidents can do nothing unless they get on the phone or by letter ask the head of the Electric Bond & Share Co. in New York. They have a president of the Texas Power & Light Co., John W. Carpenter, known to many Members of Congress; they have a president of the Dallas Power & Light Co., another subsidiary of the Electric Bond & Share Co.; they have another president of the Houston Power & Light Co., another subsidiary of Electric Bond & Share—nice men, I grant; but they are little more in this great set-up, this powerful group, than glorified office boys, because they have little or no authority to act under any circumstances or upon any occasion.

TAKE MANAGEMENT AWAY FROM NEW YORK

What I want to do is to break the hold of these superstructures, to break up these sprawling empires, so wide and so big that the law of diminishing returns begins to operate. Instead of taking power, authority, and management away from the local communities, I want to take it away from New York, from the Insulls in Chicago, and give it back to the communities of this country where it belongs. [Applause.]

There is now on file at the office of the Securities and Exchange Commission one of the best arguments in favor of the passage of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. I refer to the registration statement filed by the Standard Gas & Electric Co. covering a plan for the extension of two issues of notes due October 1, 1935. This statement, which was carefully prepared by the officers of that company and sworn to by them, is a confession of mismanagement. It shows large profits made by officers and directors at the expense of the investors whose interests they are supposed to protect, incomplete reports to shareholders as to the condition of their company, unwise—to speak charitably—disbursements of the assets of the company in the form of dividends when the directors knew, or should have known, that cash should be conserved to meet, at least partially, the maturity of the notes now sought to be extended.

It is significant that at the head of the balance sheet as of December 31, 1934, of the Standard Gas & Electric Co. filed with this registration statement there is set out that reference is made to a statement relating, among other things—

To transactions of the company in the acquisition of securities involving profits to H. M. Byllesby & Co. and to a syndicate composed principally of officers of the company.

An example of the profit made by Byllesby & Co. is found in connection with the acquisition of the common stock of United Railways Investment Holding Corporation. In this instance the company admits that stock which cost Byllesby & Co. $500 was acquired by it at a cost of $5,500,000.

In the balance sheet of the company, according to its own books and records as of December 31, 1934, total assets of $310,752,452.89 are balanced against liabilities of equal amount. However, when these assets and liabilities are restated to show necessary adjustments caused by the elimination of write-ups, inclusion of intangibles, and so forth, the total assets are reduced to $167,143,582.34. This reduction in the total assets necessarily affects the liability side of the balance sheet, so that instead of there being a surplus of $123,823,063.25, there is a deficit of $29,461,222.98. The effect of this deficit can be readily seen when it is noted that the capital stock of this company is carried at $21,626,070. So, the entire equity of the common shareholders of the Standard Gas & Electric Co. would be wiped out and the preferred stockholders' equity reduced by the amount of $7,835,162.98. Also, the remainder of the equity of the preferred stockholders would be affected by a contingent liability amounting to more than $29,000,000 arising through the claim for income taxes filed by the Internal Revenue Bureau. This additional claim for taxes is caused by the practice of the company in claiming for income-tax purposes a much larger amount for depreciation than was actually charged. In fact, the amounts so claimed have exceeded the amounts charged to income as provisions for retirements and depletion for the 9 years ending with the year 1933 by $75,120,766.94.

It is of further interest to note that the bankers who have for the last several years been in control of the Standard Gas & Electric Co. and who have participated in the profits made in connection with the sale of properties to the company, underwriting contracts and syndicates, desire to profit to a large extent through the proposed reorganization contemplated by this registration statement. The plan of reorganization provides that these bankers, H. M. Byllesby & Co., The First Boston Corporation, W. C. Langley & Co., A. C. Allyn & Co., Emanuel & Co., and Granbury, Safford & Co., are to receive 2½ percent of the principal amount of all notes deposited under the extension and deposit agreement, and in addition are to be paid their actual expenses. According to the statement of the company these bankers will receive $716,000 for acting as depositaries under this plan, the need for which appears to have been caused largely by the acts of some of the members of the syndicate. And it is of particular interest to note that such compensation is to be paid from time to time as the notes are deposited, whether or not the plan becomes operative. In others words, even though the Standard Gas & Electric Co. were to go into the hands of receivers or into bankruptcy, these bankers would receive their commissions out of any funds which might have been due the creditors.

During the 3 years—1932, 1933, and 1934—when the total net income of the Standard Gas & Electric Co. was approximately $13,613,000, dividends amounting to over $15,000,000 were paid, of which $4,700,000 were on common stock in 1932. In view of the fact that the directors knew that there was a maturity of over $25,000,000 worth of securities in October 1935, it seems to me that it is almost criminal negligence for them to have so reduced the reserves of the company by the payment of those large dividends and to thus jeopardize the investment of so many hundreds of security holders.

It is all very well for members to point out that these facts are contained in registration statements filed at the Securities and Exchange Commission pursuant to the Securities Act of 1933, and that the publicity attaching thereto will prevent such happenings in the future, but for the average investor to understand these matters he must read over 20 pages of footnotes to ascertain the meaning of the entries and adjustments in the printed balance sheet. It is to prevent such manipulation of the money of many thousands of investors that this public-utility holding company bill is proposed. This act, through the operation of its provisions, will prevent officers and directors from dealing with the corporation with which they are connected for their own profit. This act will prevent a banking syndicate from acquiring property for $500 and selling this same property to its subsidiary for $5,500,000. This act will prevent bankers from looting a company and then charging a fee for reorganizing it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 2796, the Public Utility Act of 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Joint Resolution

152, to extend to August 31, 1935, the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended (1) by striking out "July 1, 1935" wherever it appears in subsections (e), (l), and (y), and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1936"; and (2) by striking out "June 30, 1935" where it appears in the first sentence of the eighth paragraph of subsection (y), and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1936."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

"That section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended (1) by striking out 'July 1, 1935' wherever it appears in subsections (e), (1), and (y), and inserting in lieu thereof 'August 31, 1935'; and (2) by striking 'June 30, 1935' where it appears in the first sentence of the eighth paragraph of subsection (y), and inserting in lieu thereof 'August 31, 1935'; and (3) by adding to subsection (y) the following additional paragraph 'The deposits in banks which are on June 30, 1935, members of the fund or the fund for mutuals shall continue to be insured during such extended period to August 31, 1935, without liability on the part of such banks to further calls or assessment'."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was, on motion of Mr. STEAGALL, laid on the table.

ALCOHOL BEVERAGE CONTROL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5809) to amend an act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC UTILITY ACT OF 1935

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2796, the Public Utility Act of 1935.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2796, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I have requested this time that I may ask the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], a question.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for this purpose?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I simply want it placed in the RECORD that the chairman of the committee, as I understand it, is in favor of the Senate bill and is in disagreement with the bill reported by his committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is not true at all. There are some provisions in the Senate bill which I favor over the House bill, but, on the other hand, there are some provisions of the House bill which I favor over the Senate bill, because I think they are better.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss this measure this afternoon from a legal standpoint. I am not a lawyer, and have not a legal mind, but as a member of the committee I want to take a layman's view of this great and important legislation and express my thoughts of it.

Mr. Chairman, we have just heard an address delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on the utility holding company bill. For more than 4 months the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has labored hard on this measure. More than 3,000 pages of printed testimony were taken during the public hearings. The gentleman from Texas has expressed his views on the legislation now before us, and with some of his statements I am in accord. There are, however, many great and vital questions involved in this measure upon which the chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and I do not agree. I cannot agree with his position when he states he has not changed his mind on the provisions of the original bill introduced which contained the death sentence which, to my mind, is one of the most vicious and un-American proposals ever submitted to an American Congress. [Applause.]

Then, again, it is manifestly unfair to bring two charts of holding companies on the floor of the House. It leaves the impression that all holding companies are set up like these two. Why not bring in the charts of other holding companies, representatives of which appeared before our committee? These people had their day before our committee; and notwithstanding the report and the charges made by the Federal Trade Commission in their investigation, when the representatives of these holding companies appeared before our committee and made their statements they were not challenged in regard to accuracy when they appeared before our committee, and the hearings show they were not.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No; I cannot yield for the present.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say in the beginning that I am going to approach this question from a little different viewpoint than that of holding-company legislation. I believe that is a question for lawyers to handle. No one can deny that some of the electric-utility holding companies have carried on practices and abuses that are indefensible and cannot be justified in our national economic life. But why destroy all holding companies because some of them have carried on abuses and unconscionable practices in the past?

In 1928, the Chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Mr. Parker, of New York, a Republican, presented a resolution to Congress providing for an investigation of railroad holding companies, the resolution was adopted by the House. The Republican chairman of the committee selected that very able scholar, Dr. Splawn, to make the investigation. He made a very thorough investigation, and his report was presented to the committee. What did the committee do? It prepared legislation and brought it into the House, and we passed a law to regulate railroad holding companies, but not destroy them.

There is no doubt in my mind that there does exist some evils in the public-utility holding company operations which I believe can be corrected through Federal regulation without destroying the holding companies entirely. Have we come to the place in this great Government of ours when we say that we are not competent to regulate these great industrial organizations? I do not believe we have, and I think we can regulate these abuses and practices without destroying the industry entirely.

To dissolve and attempt to liquidate utility company control would mean direct loss to millions of citizens who have invested their money in utility securities. Men and women who have scrimped and saved in order to place their savings in some form of investment that will assure them protection and comfort are in danger of having these savings jeopardized. The individual investors, numbering millions, are the real owners of the holding companies, which the Wheeler bill would destroy. Every owner of an insurance policy, every investor in railroad stock, utilities, industrial, or other kinds of stocks and bonds should be concerned in the destructive provisions of the Wheeler bill. The author of the Senate holding company bill is a strong advocate of Government ownership of utilities. He has introduced in this session of Congress a bill for Government ownership of railroads.

In 1929 there were listed 573 active corporations, whose securities were carried on the recognized stock exchanges of the country. Out of that number 487, or 82 percent, were holding companies or combination holding and operating companies, and of these only 34 were utility holding companies, representing less than 6 percent of the total.

If Congress passes this destructive legislation wiping out utility holding companies, it will be the beginning of other crucifying laws which will apply to holding companies for banks, food production, insurance companies, the steel and coal industries, newspapers, automobile manufacturers, and every other line of large business.

It is a well-known fact that President Roosevelt is responsible for the legislation contained in the drastic provisions of the Wheeler bill and he insists that Congress must pass the death sentence in the House bill, wiping out utility-holding companies. Only a few days ago we heard read from the desk a message from the President of the United States sent to Congress indicating that in the near future he would recommend the passage of legislation which would abolish all holding companies, no matter what business or industry they were engaged in.

May I remind the Congress that the United States Government is the biggest holding company in the world today. It stands in the same position toward the 48 States as does electric holding companies that have an interest in 48 operating companies. It finances its operations through borrowings, bonds, notes, and note issues subscribed to by the taxpayers of the various States, and, in turn, renders service to the States which the States could not provide for themselves. I have in my possession certified copies of the charters of four large holding companies organized under the laws of the State of Delaware. These charters are signed by the secretary of state of Delaware and have attached to them the official seal of that Commonwealth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, each of these large holding companies was organized through an Executive order issued by President Roosevelt, and I doubt if there ever was a certificate of incorporation with such broad, far-reaching powers as those given to the Electric Home and Farm Authority which is a subsidiary of the Tennessee Valley Authority. [Applause.] I wish I had time to read these charters. It would take me a half hour to read the powers granted to this Government holding corporation, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, organized at the request of President Roosevelt himself. Arthur E. Morgan, Harcourt A. Morgan, and David E. Lilienthal are the directors of this holding-company corporation. They are also directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

There is no question in my mind but what the provisions of the Wheeler bill, if enacted into law, will mean nationalization of the electric-utility industry. The passage of the Wheeler bill does not mean regulation, but does mean destruction and public ownership will follow. Today we find the Federal Government engaged in spending, and will spend when the program is completed, more than $500,000,000 of the taxpayers' money in the construction of plants for the generation, transmission, and the sale of electric energy in competition with private industry. Oh, yes; I know those who favor the Government entering the electric-utilities field will try to deny that the Government is going into competition with private utilities in the generation and sale of electric energy. What are we spending the money for? Why should we spend $500,000,000 to generate electric energy if we are not going to sell it, and if we sell it we have to go into competition with private industry.

As a matter of fact, the T. V. A. is spending more money on power development than all the rest of its program put together which, when completed, will have capacity to generate more electricity than is now consumed in all of the Southeastern States. In addition to the T. V. A., the Government is spending many millions in other parts of the country constructing power plants for the generation and sale of electric energy.

One of the main objects back of this legislation before us, and I am fully convinced on this point, is to destroy electric utility operations and force Government ownership. It is misleading and untruthful for the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority to state before committees of Congress that it is not the intention of the Government to go into competition with private electric utilities. Why, a 6-year-old schoolboy would not believe that. As I said a moment ago, what is the Government spending $500,000,000 for if we are not going to go into competition with private utilities? More than $150,000,000 has been appropriated or authorized for the development of the T. V. A., most of which will be used for electric-power development.

As I have previously stated, the T. V. A. today is spending more money on electric-power development than on all the rest of its program, and I am sure no Member of Congress would advocate this large expenditure of public funds in the Tennessee Valley for the generation of electric power if there was no market for the same.

What the T. V. A. contemplates doing—and it is already in the field—is competing with private utilities in the Southeastern States. The administration and the T. V. A. directorate all admit frankly that the T. V. A. and other Government power plants are going to force down electric power rates if they have to put private industry out of business in order to do so. The President has stated that one of the main purposes of the Government in entering the electric-utility field was to establish a fair yardstick for the sale of electric current to the consuming public. The yardstick established by the T. V. A. is not fair, it is misleading, it is untruthful, because it is based upon reduced carrying charges and interest rates and other preferentials and advantages which no private company could meet and still do business.

Let me state a few of the advantages which the T. V. A. enjoys and which the yardstick does not disclose. They are as follows:

No share of overhead and general expense of the Federal Government, no financing expense, no interest charges, except that they may have to pay 3½ percent on moneys while a private utility has to pay 6½ percent for the same, no insurance charges—the Government carries the risk—no State or Federal workmen's compensation to pay, no real-estate taxes to pay, no automobile tax to pay, no gasoline tax to pay, no 3 percent special utility tax to pay, no Federal income tax to pay, no corporation tax to pay—and in the new tax bill we are going to run the corporation tax up to about 17 percent—rebates on railroads on both passenger and freight service, free postage under the Government franking system, free use of other Government departments, free use of office rooms in Federal buildings, immunity from the expense of regulation, keeping its own accounts to suit its own purposes, including the charging off of power costs to social uplift, navigation improvements, and so forth.

Let us take the Wilson Dam, and I think I am correct when I say that it cost $60,000,000 to build Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals and to install the machinery for the development of electric energy. What did the T. V. A. do? They charged $20,000,000 up to the construction of that dam and then they took the other $40,000,000 and charged it off to soil erosion, flood control, and navigation. So, insofar as Wilson Dam is concerned, the yardstick is not fair, because they are going to base their rates on a $20,000,000 investment when, as a matter of fact, it cost $60,000,000 to construct that dam. [Applause.]

This is the kind of yardstick that the T. V. A. is proposing, and I have just enumerated some of the advantages

T. V. A. enjoys over private industry. This is the yardstick used by the President and the T. V. A. in establishing a fair rate on electric power sold to consumers.

There is not a private utility in operation today that can exist and meet such unfair competition as that set up by the T. V. A.

I will tell you what I think about the T. V. A., and it is just my own personal opinion. I may shock some of you when I say it, but I say to you it is the biggest piece of collectivism, based on the policies of some of the foreign countries, that this Nation of ours has ever undertaken.

Oh, it was brought out in our committee, and I dislike very much to bring this up, when Mr. David E. Lilienthal, the executive assistant and one of the directors of T. V. A., was questioned, that down there where they are building the town of Norris, and they have from 2,000 to 2,500 people employed, they will not allow a church in that community, and the question was asked of Mr. Lilienthal——

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking on the holding-company bill.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Oh, sit down.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I make that point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COOLEY). The gentleman from Ohio will proceed in order.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I think the T. V. A. has something to do with the provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is sure the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. When the direct question was put to Mr. Lilienthal, if they would permit a church down there and he said, "No; absolutely not."

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, may I have a ruling on my point of order.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we demand a ruling on the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the gentleman is in order in discussing the matter referred to.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have here in my possession a report reprint of the journal of the National Educational Association, published here at Washington, under date of December 1914.

It is published by the National Education Association, 1201 Sixteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

There are 16 pages all devoted to T. V. A. activities. It was written by a man named Walter E. Myer. When I asked Mr. Lilienthal, one of the three directors of the T. V. A., if he knew Mr. Myer, he said, "Yes." I said, "Did you employ him to write the article?" and he said, "Yes." I said, "Did you order 50,000 copies of this publication printed at public expense?" and he said, "Yes." I said, "What did you do this for?" and he said, "To send them out over the country."

Now, I cannot go into all the details regarding this publication, but let me call your attention to what is on the last page.

Some day students of American history will read about the development of the Tennessee Valley as one of the great events in the life of the Republic.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No; I refuse to yield until I make my statement. The gentleman will have his opportunity later.

Mr. RANKIN. I hope so.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The prime purpose of this legislation is public ownership of utilities. I want to go a little farther and tell you why I think so. The legal counsel of the P. W. A.—I want you Members of Congress to get this—has sent out proposed drafts of bills to every State in this Union, requesting the legislatures they be enacted into law for the purpose of creating power districts in the States. Five of these proposed drafts were introduced into the Legislature of Ohio, my home State, and the representative who introduced them resides in one of the counties in my congressional district. He stood on the floor of the assembly room in the State of Ohio and said that he was introducing these bills at the request of President Roosevelt. The P. W. A. encouraged the passage of power-district legislation in the 48 States by announcing the Public Works Administration was ready to assist in financing the construction of public-owned electric-power plants, by contributing outright 30 percent on the construction cost and loaning 70 percent on long-time loans at low rate of interest.

Again, Mr. Ickes asked the State of Texas to pass enabling legislation creating districts for aiding pipe lines for natural gas from the Panhandle fields of Texas to St. Louis and Chicago and up into the Northwest, and was willing to let them have $60,000,000 to construct that pipe line. I understand that the Texas Legislature has passed enabling legislation, but I do not know whether the $60,000,000 has yet been granted.

If the Congress desires government ownership of electric utilities, let us say so and pass the Wheeler bill. Some foreign countries have passed through the miserable failure and experience of government ownership.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. No; I cannot yield. I have expressly requested not to be interrupted until I finish my statement. Our neighbors in Canada have had state ownership of business enterprises for many years in one form or another, and the result is well described in an editorial which appeared in the Montreal News Herald of December 19, 1934, from which I quote:

State ownership of business enterprises is a Utopian fallacy that, like a will-o'-the-wisp, leads into a bog of endless trouble. Its evils are writ large upon Canada now.

Take the railways. State ownership began with the old Intercolonial which looked like a boon to the Maritime Provinces, but which sapped those Provinces of initiative for generations and did nothing to develop their resources, because there was no incentive to make it pay.

Take the blighting influence of railway ownership and provincial backing of railway finance on the Prairie Provinces and on British Columbia, which Provinces by these means piled up mountainous debts that the Dominion had to assume "to save the credit of Canada."

Take the Dominion's railway and merchant marine ownership policies—classic examples of the blight and burden of "politics in business."

Take the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario. Sitting right on the top of Niagara's power it ought to be a marvelous success if there were any virtue in public ownership.

Instead of that its members have been kicked out and a newspaperman, dragged out of retirement to run it, has shocked even its staunchest friends by the revelation he has made of its deficiencies—and worse.

The Canadian National Railway is publicly owned and managed and the Canadian Pacific Railway is privately owned. In the report of the Royal Commission to Inquire Into Railways and Transportation in Canada, issued in September 1932, there appears a statement of comparative earnings which shows that for the 9 years ending with 1931, inclusive, the Canadian National Railway had a deficit of $182,442,533, whereas the Canadian Pacific, privately owned, regulated by the Dominion commerce law, charging the same rates, paying the same wage scale as the Government-owned lines, had during the same period a surplus of $312,879,978. Furthermore, the Dominion Government has an investment in the Canadian National Railway of $2,536,665,000.

I cannot forget the statement made by the greatest engineer and genius of all time, Mr. Thomas Edison, when he said:

> There is far more danger in public monopoly than there is in private monopoly, for when the Government goes into business it can always shift its losses to the taxpayers. If it goes into the power business it can pretend to sell cheap power and then cover up its losses * * *. Certainly it should regulate the rates although in a businesslike fashion. Then the public is protected and at the same time the ingenuity of private enterprise has a chance to function. Any large extension of government into business affairs, no matter what the pretense, and no matter how the extension is labeled, will be bound to promote waste and put a curb on our prosperity and progress.

No Member of Congress had anything to do with the drafting of the original House bill. I do not know who drafted the Wheeler bill, but I know that no Member of Congress had anything to do with the drafting of the House bill when it was presented to our committee. It was written by the smart young men in our Government bureaus. I see some of them here in the gallery today. They helped to put up these charts a while ago.

During the hearings on the measure there were from 10 to 25 of these young "brain trusters" on the Government pay roll in the committee room every day. They occupied one long row which was classified as "intelligentia row." I see several of them in the gallery now. Not one of these experts, who worked on this mesaure and who have never had a practical day's experience in business or industry in their lives, could tell the committee how the dissolution of holding companies could take place without serious loss to millions of American citizens who invested their money in utility stocks. I have high regard for Dr. Splawn. He is a brilliant man. He opened up the hearings in our committee and he closed the hearings. When he began his last statement before the committee he said, "This is the most important piece of legislation that Congress has had to consider for a decade." When the time came around I could question him I said, "Doctor, when you appeared before the committee in the first instance we asked you who was responsible for the drafting of this bill. I believe you stated you had something to do with it, also Ben Cohen, and Mr. Corcoran, as well as the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Power Commission.

"At that time the committee made a very sincere and earnest request of you or some of the others who are responsible for bringing this legislation to the House to tell the committee how the break-down and the dissolution of the holding companies could take place without serious loss to millions of American citizens who invested their money in utility stocks. That request has not been answered. I believe you must realize the great responsibility resting on the committee in charge of this important measure. Will you please tell the committee now how the break-down of utilities can take place without serious loss to millions of investors?" If my memory serves me right, this was his answer: "That is for the committee to work out, Mr. COOPER."

No representative of the Commerce or Treasury Departments, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or the Federal Reserve Board appeared before the committee in favor of this legislation. There were no Government agencies before the committee in favor of this legislation except the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, and Dr. Splawn—not one. No business or industrial leaders appeared for the measure. No representative of labor advocated the passage of this legislation.

Now, it is not my purpose to try to defend utility holding companies. They exist, and they were permitted to organize under the laws of the land. They represent the savings of millions of Americans. Abuses of the past should be corrected, but correction does not mean annihilation.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. I told the gentleman I was not going to yield, and I wish he would not insist that I yield now.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I object, and I ask the Chair to protect the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANKIN. I addressed my remarks to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, in closing may I state it is a self-evident proposition that you cannot dissolve or dismember a holding company without injuring the person who owns securities in that company. The distressing effect which the dissolution of holding companies would have upon operating companies has already been eloquently testified to by 560 savings banks in this country with their 14,000,000 depositors; by religious organizations, churches, insurance companies, endowment funds, schools, and colleges who have protested against the destructive features which still remain in the Senate bill.

I believe the Members of the House must have become aware of a certain fear that seems to have crept into the minds of the American people in regard to what Congress is going to do to business. I am not talking now about organized propaganda on the part of business interests, seeking to defend themselves from attack; nor am I referring particularly to the hundreds of thousands of letters which have come to Members of Congress from investors who fear that their investment is threatened; but I am speaking of statements made by nonpartisan business and civic organizations, not engaged in any special campaign for one thing or another. I am speaking of the thousands of editorial opinions that have been appearing with increasing frequency in newspapers. I am speaking of statements by individuals of unquestionable integrity and ability. It seems to me the consensus of those Nation-wide sentiments that we have moved a little forward out of the depression of the past several years, and that we are ready to do better still if we can only be permitted to operate under reasonable laws. There are millions in the bread lines still.

There are millions more on relief, but no one can question the fact that recovery of business will do far more to make it possible for a man to earn his living again, for families to be independent of charity, than all of the $4,880,000,000 which the Government has ready to distribute for relief purposes; but this recovery is hampered today because of fear, and this fear has been particularly promoted by the discussions which have taken place on this public-utility bill, statements made by officials of the Government asserting amazing hatred of the public-utility industry, heaping abuses upon it, declaring that their intention was to eliminate utility holding companies and other companies in other businesses as well. I think that all of us have been made aware of this fear. We must realize the enormous importance as a psychological deterrent to the Nation's progress.

Now, we can do much to allay this fear in our attitude on this bill. We can do much to increase the confidence of the people in their representatives in Congress if we reject the policy of ruthless destruction which to my mind the Senate bill represents, and endorse the policy of regulation, drastic and complete as it may be, which is embodied in this bill now before the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] yields back 15 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 28 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I likewise ask that I be not interrupted until I have concluded my statement. In discussing this proposed legislation, I desire to state that I do not directly or indirectly own or control a single share of stock or a single bond in any company or its subsidiary which might in any way be affected by any of the provisions of the proposed Public Utility Act of 1935. Furthermore, during my 36 years of practice at the bar of Philadelphia, I have never been retained by nor represented a public-utility company, although I have represented thousands of claimants in cases in which public-utility companies have been defendants. I make this statement merely for the purpose of assuring the House that anything I might say concerning the proposed legislation is entirely devoid of self-interest and is the result of a careful consideration of the provisions of the bill and what, in my judgment, will be the disastrous effects of its enactment.

I hold no brief for the alleged iniquitous practices of some unscrupulous utility companies, but I am not one who believes that in order to cure an ill it is necessary to kill the patient.

The reason for the proposed legislation apparently seems to be contained in the bill of particulars wherein there is listed nine separate charges of so-called "evils", supposedly based on the reports of the Federal Trade Commission and otherwise. Even if true, in none of these, can I for the life of me see a single instance in which the evil complained of could not be cured by the enactment of the proper kind of regulatory legislation, either by the individual States or by Congress, without ruthlessly and deliberately destroying the lifetime savings of hundreds of thousands of our citizens. If it is the purpose of Congress to add to the already overburdened relief roll, I can see no surer method than that proposed in this bill.

Either the animus or the ulterior motive which has inspired the drafting of this proposed legislation is made apparent in the language of subsection C on page 158, where it is stated that these evils have become so persistent and wide-spread that they necessitate legislation. To do what? To rectify? No! To cure the so-called "abuses"? No! To regulate? No! But to "eliminate the holding company" with all the dire consequences to follow, by the order of the Commission on or after January 1, 1938, 1 year being allowed for its dissolution with a possible extension of 1 year.

It reminds me very much of the story they tell about the two Englishmen who were engaged in an altercation in the gallery of a theater in London. The fight became quite strenuous when one of the combatants lifted the other over his head and was about to throw him into the pit below, when a voice with a cockney accent cried out, "Heigh, old top! don't woist 'im, kill the fiddler with 'im."

No one can object to a judicious restraint upon holding-company abuses which have been proved or which in the natural course of events can be seen and, therefore, prohibited, but this should be done by corrective measures which do not do more harm than good, and no destruction of thrift and saving in the American people, principles upon which the advancement of this great country and its citizens has always been founded should be permitted in the guise of reform.

In mitigation of the drastic provisions of the bill a great deal of reference has been made publicly to the provision which provides, inter alia, that a holding company may continue upon obtaining from the Commission a certificate that its continuance is necessary, geographically and economically, in serving an economic district extending into two or more contiguous States, and so forth.

The provisions of the bill dealing with this question boiled down means nothing more or less than the life of a holding company is entirely dependent upon the rules and regulations, the whims and fancies of a Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, without recourse to any other authority.

It is provided:

> No provisions in this bill shall apply to, or be deemed to include, the United States, a State, or any political subdivision of a State, or any agency, authority, or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing, or any corporation which is wholly owned directly or indirectly thereby by any one or more of the foregoing, or any officer, agent, or employee of any of the foregoing acting as such in the course of his official duty, unless such provision makes specific reference thereto.

This provision can have but one meaning, and the ulterior motive in the minds of the framers of this proposed legislation is made apparent. Under this provision there is permitted the very thing which the bill itself seeks to prevent, namely, the creation of the most gigantic holding company ever conceived—the United States Government with its subsidiaries, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, and a host of other alphabetical units capable of creation under the reckless delegation of authority by the Seventy-third Congress; the ultimate result can be only one thing, and that Government ownership of industry. A scheme that has been battling for 2 years past, fostered by political and administrative propaganda, misleading the general public into the hope of reduction of rates by the use of a fictitious yardstick which does not truthfully account for total capital outlay and costs chargeable to other departments and bureaus; nor does it take into account vast additional taxes which must be levied and paid for by our citizens to meet the tremendous obligations incurred by our Government in embarking upon this fantastic and questionable enterprise. I care not how well-meaning the intention, it is sure to die of its own weight or be wrecked upon the rocks of political patronage.

Notwithstanding the so-called "evils" of holding companies, they have been instrumental in many ways in developing our country, such as intercity and interstate transmission lines; the common use of technical talent; the establishment of great laboratories and research fields for the use of all and the facilities of industrially backward sections of the country, and have to a large degree been responsible for the extraordinary development of our industrial system as a whole. These good qualities should not be overlooked, and holding companies should not be sacrificed and eliminated because of a scheming desire to saddle Government ownership upon the shoulders of an unsuspecting people.

What would be the disastrous results of the enactment of this bill? As I see them, it would mean:

A serious interference with the Nation's gas and electric service.

The destruction of the value of securities held by millions of innocent investors.

The beginning of Government ownership of gas and electric utilities with all its attendant risk of loss and a heavy burden of taxation added to the already overload, possibly to be followed by the destruction of industrial and commercial enterprises, paving the way for a broadening of Government ownership in all classes of industry.

This is no far-fetched reasoning, because the very attitude of the present administration in advocating the adoption of this its child, born in an obsession and reared upon the milk of destruction, gives force to the conclusion that the present administration is determined to follow a course, un-American in every aspect and a threat to every business, to every industry, and to every investor.

Along that road neither I nor the constituency that I have the honor to represent propose to travel.

In support of this contention, let us look at a few historical facts:

A glance at some of the principal planks of the Socialist Party platform for the Presidential election of 1932 reveals the interesting fact that the main outlines of the new deal, which partisan critics of the Roosevelt administration are unable to locate in the Democratic Party program of that year, were quite definitely indicated by Mr. Norman Thomas and his half-shell Marxists. Among them are the following:

Federal appropriations of $5,000,000,000 for immediate relief and an additional five billions for a public-works program—now expressed in the P. W. A., F. E. R. A., and the current work-relief measure.

Socialization of power, banking, and other industries—approached in T. V. A. yardstick, proposed amendments to Federal Reserve Act, deposit insurance, and so forth.

Establishment of Federal marketing agencies and extension of agricultural cooperatives—approached through A. A. A. marketing agreements.

To this comprehensive program Mr. Thomas added the observation in his campaign pamphlet, The Socialist Cure for a Sick Society, that—

> These things will not take place or will be relatively futile until we press actual change in ownership of land, natural resources, and principal means of production.

That this is the motive of the present administration is borne out by the land policy section of the Department of Agriculture, the Power Commission, utility holding company proposals, the T. V. A., and the program of the National Resources Board.

On July 14, 1924, in the city of Cleveland, there was adopted by the National Convention of the Party for Progressive Political Action a set of resolutions which contained inter alia the following platform planks:

Public ownership of the Nation's water power and creation of a public superpower system. Strict public control and permanent conservation of all natural resources, including coal, iron and other ores, oil, and timber lands.

Reconstruction of the Federal farm-loan systems to provide for direct public control of the Nation's money and credit.

Creation of a Government marketing corporation.

Public ownership of railroads.

Election of all Federal judges without party designation for limited terms.

The Democratic convention of 1932, held at Chicago, Ill., and which nominated Franklin D. Roosevelt for President of the United States, adopted a platform which, inter alia, contained the following:

We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when intrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe. We hereby declare this to be the platform of the Democratic Party:

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government.

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues.

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

The removal of Government from all fields of private enterprise except where necessary to develop public works and natural resources in the common interest.

Regulation to the full extent of Federal power of holding companies which sell securities in interstate commerce.

We condemn the extravagance of the Farm Board, its disastrous action which made the Government a speculator of farm products, and the unsound policy of restricting agricultural products to the demands of domestic markets.

On this platform Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected President of the United States, and immediately after his induction into office, under the head of emergency legislation, got the Congress to pass certain laws which delegated to him a power heretofore unheard of in the hands of the Nation's Chief Executive.

Among these laws were:

The Agricultural Adjustment Act, which gave the Secretary of Agriculture the power to provide for reduction in acreage or reduction in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity; and to enter into marketing agreements, and so forth.

The National Industrial Recovery Act, which authorized the President to establish agencies and delegate functions and powers relating to trade, industry, and so forth, public works and construction projects and subsistence homesteads.

The Tennessee Valley Authority, with vast power over the natural resources in the Tennessee Valley and the products resulting therefrom, such as fertilizer products and electrical power.

After the grant of these tremendous powers by the Seventy-third Congress the platform of the Democratic Party of 1932, to a great measure, was sidetracked and forgotten and there was then publicly acknowledged as the guiding hands of the administration those who formed the resolutions committee and drafted the platform adopted in Cleveland in 1924 at the national convention of the Party for Progressive Political Action and were given key positions in the present administration.

The members of that resolution committee and the framers of the platform of 1924, with the positions they occupy under the present administration, are: Donald R. Richberg, "Assistant President of the United States"; Basil Manly, member, Federal Power Commission; Sidney Hillman, Consumers' Advisory Board, N. R. A.; Frederick C. Howe, Consumers' Council, A. A. A.; J. A. Franklin, N. R. A. Labor Advisory Board; Rose Schneiderman, N. R. A. Labor Advisory Board; A. A. Berle, Jr., an original "brain truster"; Rexford G. Tugwell, Under Secretary of Agriculture.

What are the past and present affiliations of these powerful factors in the present administration; and I glean this information from the book by Dilling, The Red Network, published in 1934:

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to the bill, as required by the rule adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the Chair please, I maintain that I am speaking to the bill. I made the contention that this bill was a plan for Government ownership of all industry. I am backing that statement up by incontrovertible facts.

Donald R. Richberg: Socialist; Chicago lawyer; member of League for Industrial Democracy, which is highly subsidized by Garland Fund, which spreads socialistic Communist propaganda and literature in colleges; prepares and widely distributes thousands of Communist and Socialist pamphlets; agitates for Government ownership of all banking, transportation, insurance, communication, mining, agricultural, and manufacturing enterprises, forest and oil reserves, and for socialization of land and other property; advocates a social order based on production for use and not for profit of the individual; contributes to New Republic, a weekly magazine which advocates revolutionary socialism.

Basil M. Manly: Socialist; member of the Garland Fund Committee; contributing editor to the Intercollegiate Socialist Society Organ; and was member of the defense committee of the Industrial Workers of the World—I. W. W.—which organization was composed of Socialists and anarchists, the underlying principle of which was the organization of industrial workers into unions to war against employers by any and all means, to overthrow the Government, and establish a government by unions.

Sidney Hillman: Was director of the Garland Fund; member of defense committee, I. W. W.; honorary president of the National Religion and Labor Foundation, organized in 1932, which advocates radical social action.

Rose Schneiderman: Communist sympathizer. An organizer of the People's Council, an organization modeled after the Workmen and Soldiers' Council, the sovereign power of Russia today.

Rexford Guy Tugwell: Contributor to New Republic, advocate of revolutionary socialism. Member of technical staff of Communist-organized First American Trade Union delegation to Russia. This was exulted over by the Communist Party and repudiated and denied the sanction of the American Federation of Labor because of its communistic character. Coauthor of the Soviet propaganda book entitled "Soviet Russia in the Second Decade." Professor of economics at Columbia University, who offered Donald Henderson, ousted as a Communist, a research fellowship for 1 year in U. S. S. R. A director of the Socialist People's Lobby. Member of the National Advisory Council on "radio in education", which broadcasts in cooperation with the Socialist League for Industrial Democracy, featuring radical speakers and recommends radical books. Delivered an address before the American Economic Association in 1932 entitled "The Principle of Planning and the Institution of Laissez Faire", which appeared in the January 1933 issue, in which he stated:

"Planning will necessarily become a function of the Federal Government; either that or the planning agency will supersede that Government, which is why, of course, such a scheme will eventually be assimilated to the State rather than possess some of its powers without its responsibilities. Business will logically be required to disappear. This is not an overstatement for the sake of emphasis; it is literally meant. The essence of business is its free venture for profits in an unregulated economy. Planning implies guidance of capital uses. * * * Adjustment of production to consumption * * * the insurance of adequate buying capacity. * * * New industries will not just happen as the automobile industry did; they will have to be foreseen, to be argued for, or seem probably desirable features of the whole economy before they can be entered upon. * * * There is no denying that the contemporary situation in the United States has explosive possibilities. The future is becoming visible in Russia; the present is bitterly in contrast; politicians, theorists, and vested interests seem to conspire ideally for the provocation to violence of a long-patient people. No one can pretend to know how the release of this pressure is likely to come. Perhaps our statesmen will give way or be more or less gently removed from duty; perhaps our vested interests will submit to control without too violent resistance. It is difficult to believe that any of these will happen; it seems just as incredible that we may have a revolution. Yet the new kind of economic machinery we have in prospect cannot function in our present economy. The contemporary situation is one in which all the choices are hard; yet one of them has to be made."

Tugwell is now Assistant "Commissar" of Agriculture and leader of Roosevelt's "brain trust."

Shortly after the enactment of this so-called "emergency legislation" and the attachment of the above-mentioned individuals to the public pay roll, with the power granted under these and other emergency laws, there have been created certain private corporations, agencies of the administration, the incorporators of which are members of the so-called "brain trust" and department Secretaries.

On October 17, 1933, there was incorporated in the State of Delaware the Commodity Credit Corporation, the incorporators of which were Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture; Oscar Johnson, Agricultural Adjustment Administration; H. Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury.

Under these articles of incorporation they are authorized, inter alia, to do all things necessary to accomplish the purposes of the acts above specified, as—

A–B. To purchase or otherwise acquire, to hold or otherwise to deal in, to sell or otherwise dispose of any or all agricultural or other commodities or products thereof, and to loan or borrow money upon the same.

C. To enter into agreements, to provide for reduction in acreage or reduction in products for market of agricultural commodities.

D. To engage in any activity in connection with production, carrying, shipping, storing, exporting, warehousing, handling, preparing, manufacturing, processing, and marketing of agricultural commodities or products thereof. To borrow money, issue bonds, mortgages, notes, bills of exchange, and all kinds of obligations without limit as to amount.

E. To borrow money for purchasing, storing, handling, or processing of agricultural or other commodities and disposing of the same.

G. To take and hold for any of its purposes any property, real or personal, anywhere in the United States and any foreign countries without limit as to amount or value.

I. To make and carry out contracts of every kind and description, without limit as to amount, with any person, firm, corporation, municipality, county, State, or government.

J. To sell, deal in, store, handle, process, transport agricultural or other commodities or products thereof by itself or through other agencies, and to make contracts for the purchase or sale of the same on behalf of the owner thereof.

K. To acquire by purchase, lease, or construction, or in any other manner storage and other physical facilities for the handling, and so forth, of agricultural or other commodities or products thereof.

L. To establish offices anywhere in the world.

This corporation to have perpetual existence.

Another private corporation is the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, incorporated in the State of Delaware, October 4, 1933, the incorporators being Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture; Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior; and Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator.

The purposes of the Corporation are the distribution of agricultural and other commodities and, in general, without restriction or limit, to purchase, sell, mortgage real and personal property of every class, and under the amended articles of incorporation, approved January 11, 1934, to sell and dispose of all agricultural or other commodities and products thereof, and to loan and borrow money on the same and engage in any activity in connection therewith, such as producing, carrying, shipping, storing, exporting, warehousing, handling, preparing, manufacturing, processing, and marketing of all agricultural or other commodities or products thereof; to endorse notes, and so forth, to take and hold for any of its purposes any property without limitation anywhere in the world, to guarantee, purchase, and so forth, capital stock, bond, or securities created by any other corporation; to sell, deal in, and so forth, agricultural or other commodities. The corporation to have perpetual existence.

On November 21, 1933, an amended certificate of incorporation of the Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation was approved, the incorporators being Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior; Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, and Robert D. Kohn.

Under this the corporation is given the power to construct, reconstruct, alter or repair, and financially aid low-cost housing and slum clearance projects of every kind, and buildings and structures of every kind, nature, or description; to acquire real estate and buildings by purchase, exchange, or the exercise of the power of eminent domain; to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of such real estate, and so forth, or to lease with, or without, the privilege of purchase; to manufacture, buy, sell, and so forth, building and other material and supplies of every kind, nature, or description; to do and perform the acts customarily done or performed by architects, engineers, and general contractors without limitation; also to supply heat, steam, water, gas and electricity, transportation, telephone and other facilities or utilities, and to carry on its operations in business without restriction or limitation as to amount; to acquire by purchase, exchange, or otherwise all or any part of any business and good-will of any person, firm, association, or corporation engaged in any business for which a corporation may now or hereafter be organized under the laws of the State of Delaware; to borrow money without limit.

The Electric Home and Farm Authority was incorporated in the State of Delaware January 17, 1934, by Arthur E. Morgan, National Emergency Council; Harcourt A. Morgan, Tennessee Valley Authority; David E. Lilienthal, Tennessee Valley Authority; and has the power to manufacture, buy, sell, and so forth, and carry on the business of manufacturing, buying, selling, and so forth, electric appliances and equipment, and to finance the same without limit anywhere in the world, to grant licenses and territorial rights in respect thereto; to purchase, acquire, hold, own, develop, mortgages, lands, and leaseholds and any other interest; to take over the business of any person, firm, association, trust, or corporation engaged in this character of work; the corporation to exist for seven years, and was created under an Executive order of the President of the United States dated December 19, 1933.

The Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperatives, Inc., was incorporated under the laws of the State of Tennessee by Arthur E. Morgan, National Emergency Council; Harcourt A. Morgan, Tennessee Valley Authority; David E. Lilienthal, Tennessee Valley Authority; for the purpose or reorganizing, establishing, managing, financing, and so forth, cooperative enterprises in the Tennessee Valley and contiguous areas, and to set up a chain of cooperative enterprises; to produce, raise, manufacture, buy, sell, and so forth, farm products, livestock, goods, wares, and merchandise of every class and description and to finance the same without limit as to amount; to acquire and hold copyrights, trade marks, trade names, brands, labels, patent rights, and so forth, inventions, improvements, and processes; the business to be financed by grants of money from the Federal Emergency Relief Corporation; the Corporation to have perpetual existence.

It needs no stretch of the imagination to readily see the abandonment of the Democratic platform of 1932 under which the American people were induced to support a Democratic candidate for the office of the President of the United States and the full adoption, after his election and induction into office, by the present administration of the socialistic principles set forth in the platform adopted in Cleveland in 1924 by the national convention of the Party for Progressive Political Action, which was repudiated by the American people in November of that year by the election of a Republican President, as well as the adoption of the principles set forth in the Socialistic platform of 1932, which was likewise repudiated at the polls.

These beginnings are now being followed in natural sequence by the pressure of the Democratic Administration upon the Seventy-fourth Congress to enact so-called "must bills" which further extend the power and control of the National Government over every phase of industry and endeavor in the country.

The Federal Government under its present policies is fast slipping from a mere central agent for the sovereign States to a centralized government dominating economic as well as political affairs of the Nation.

To finance these vast actual and prospective socialistic activities of the administration numerous bills have been presented to this Congress, emanating from its departments and myriad alphabetical bureaus.

Under the recent public-works bill appropriating $4,800,000,000 in one lump sum, there is placed in the hands of the President an unheard-of peace-time appropriation. Over this vast sum he has practically unlimited power to do with as he sees fit.

Under the pending social-security bill an unemployment trust fund is set up in the United States Treasury which is to receive all money deposited therein by a State agency from a State unemployment fund. This fund over a brief period of years is estimated to amount to many billions of dollars. By the same act it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury is to invest these funds only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. This enables the Government to appropriate the unemployment funds received from the State, collected by the State from its employers and employees, for the financing of the projects of its private as well as its public agencies in competition with private industry.

The pending Banking and Currency Act places the credit and finances of the country in the hands of a Federal Reserve Board, the powers of which are broadened, but which is also subject to the domination both as to policy and politics by the administration.

An analysis of the bill shows that the Federal Reserve banks can purchase obligations of Government corporations. This would include all governmental agencies whose obligations are guaranteed both as to principal and interest and the banks could very readily be forced to finance Government competition with, or Government ownership of private industry.

The enactment of the holding-company bill is but one more step toward the goal set up in the platform of the Party for Progressive Political Action adopted in 1924 and the platform of the Socialist Party of 1932, and both of which have since been appropriated by the Democratic Administration, lock, stock, and barrel.

Let us take time off to consider the cost, and ask ourselves the serious question as to whether the results justify the tremendous outlay of public funds, bearing in mind that the 3 fiscal years of the present administration call for a spending of $24,206,533,000, or, in other words, $13,000 every minute of the day and night, of which $7,000 per minute is being added to the public debt to be paid by future generations.

I do not approach this question from a partisan, political angle, but base my conclusion upon my personal observation of the condition in the district which I represent, which to me is a barometer of conditions generally throughout the country.

My congressional district represents a cross section of one of the Nation's great municipalities, Philadelphia. It has a resident population of over 240,000, which population is in normal times augmented every day by at least 500,000 employed therein, the richest and the poorest, with a great mass of those formerly having moderate means residing within its confines. It contains the headquarters for three large railroads of the country, the Pennsylvania, the Reading, and the Baltimore & Ohio; all large department stores; all large hotels; every skyscraper office building; a great number of retail businesses; many of the large hospitals and charitable institutions in the city, and in normal times was a beehive of industrial activity.

Today there are more people out of work and on the relief rolls than there were a year ago. For-sale and for-rent signs play a prominent part on its structures, both as to business and private homes. Space in its office buildings has gone begging. Most of its hotels are either in the hands of receivers or being operated by bondholders' committees. Millions of dollars in taxes on its real estate are unpaid and cannot be collected.

The so-called "governmental experiments" have proved a rank failure insofar as my people are concerned, and we daily watch and pray for the time to come when business will again be permitted to resume its normal functions, shorn of the shackles of bureaucratic domination.

To all intents and purposes this is an age of experimentation insofar as our administrative affairs are concerned, but it is self-evident that each experiment is leading us farther astray into a realm of uncertainty and failure. If we continue in this unjustified and unwarranted manner in blindly following the lead of bureaucractic government, the time is not far distant when we will be enveloped in chaos and destruction.

The sooner we become self-conscious of the fact that our problems are largely individualistic, that our return to normalcy depends upon individualistic effort, and stop inculcating into the minds of our people the thought that the Government owes each one of them a living without effort, the sooner we shall find a direct and safe road to recovery.

No one objects to a proper, legitimate, safe, and sane safeguarding of the individual from exploitation whether that be from the standpoint of labor or the standpoint of capital, but what we need is a crusade in the interest of a return to the sound fundamentals of government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Commiteee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 2796, the Public Utility Act of 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

STILL FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A still further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 5809. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia."

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I address myself to you today upon the subject of religious persecution in Mexico. In adding my voice to the host of others that have been raised in protest against the lawless and barbarous acts of those that constitute themselves the Government of Mexico, I speak as a Christian woman and as such I like to feel that here, before this great body that is representative of the American people, whatever I may say in defense of Christianity and Judaism, as well as on behalf of all those who believe in God—for that, and that alone is the underlying issue in Mexico today—will fall upon sympathetic ears. I like to feel that here in this hallowed Chamber, dedicated to the noble work of furthering the ends of a democratic form of government, a form of government the very vitals of which are freedom of religious worship, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press. I like to feel that there are those who like myself look with extreme disfavor upon the travesty of government that is masking as democratic below the Rio Grande. It is my purpose to present the case against the government by evidence that is clear and overwhelming. Evidence, not alone from Christians but from members of other faiths, from history, and from documents and pronouncements of the Mexican Government itself. And in so presenting the case I am content, so far as the people of this Nation are concerned, to let the evidence speak for itself.

Benito Mussolini once said:

All history of western civilization from the Roman Empire to modern times, from Diocletian to Bismarck, teaches that when the state undertakes a fight against religion it is the state which will emerge defeated in the end. A struggle against religion is a struggle against the spirit in its most intimate and profound form.

To the average citizen of the United States, the citizen who keeps abreast of domestic and international developments largely through headlines in the press, the dominant issue in the Mexican situation is the Christian church. Much of this information inspired by the Mexican Embassy here in Washington, by consular agents about the country, by an official Mexican broadcast, by paid propagandists, is deficient not only in fact but in veracity. The Mexican Government has made God, Himself, the dominant issue in this policy of religious persecution.

It has utilized alleged grievances against the Catholic Church some centuries old as a pretext, a convenient mask for the real work of driving Almighty God from Mexican soil. At one time the argument was, "The Catholic Church in Mexico was fabulously rich." The Mexican Government confiscated whatever riches the church possessed, all invested in hospitals, churches, schools, charitable institutions, and other religious works. It destroyed churches, orphanages, schools, colleges, and other institutions of religion. As a result the religious groups were no longer "fabulously rich." It was poverty stricken as far back as the days of Juarez in 1857. That argument, then, so far as the radicals, the Mexican reds, were concerned, was no longer available. But then came another argument, another political slogan for the reds: "Mexico is clergy ridden." And, despite the fact that the total number of ministers of religion and religious in all of Mexico was never more than 9,000 for a population of 7,000,000 souls, ministers of religion were driven out by scores, until in 1850 there were less than 4,000, and today for a population of over 15,000,000 there are less than 300. And I might add that in 14 of 30 Mexican States there are not any priests at all. The contention, then, that the church is the disturbing element in the Mexican domestic situation can no longer be regarded as tenable. The church has been despoiled of its alleged "fabulous riches" and its clergy reduced to a bare minimum so far as numbers are concerned. What occasion, then, for further persecution, for burnings, for pillagings, and for slaughter of humble worshipers of God? The National Revolutionary Party, nominated for a decade by General Calles, so-called "iron man"—but iron only in the sense that he is mechanical in carrying out the dictates of his superiors at Moscow—the party of Mr. Calles, an insignificant minority, backed by bayonets and red money, proclaims to the world, and especially to the American people, that Catholic clergy in Mexico, no longer "fabulously rich", no longer great in numbers, now are fomenting rebellion, plotting the overthrow of Señor Calles, Señor Morones, and others of the same military clique that have made themselves millionaires in the work of "saving Mexico from the clergy." Think of it; Señor Calles, the "iron man", the greatest caballero of all Mexico, trembles in fear of 300 humble, poverty-stricken clergy, some of them in hiding, others eking out a bare existence. Señor Calles, with his modernized army, his airplanes, and his support from red Russia, tells the world that he apprehends grave possibilities from a corporal's guard of poverty-stricken, penniless clergy. Or is it that the clergy gives rise to his apprehension; or the fact that the truth at last is seeping out from Mexico, the truth that Señor Calles knows will bring upon his head the wrath of all Christian, Jewish, and religious peoples?

A GODLESS CONSTITUTION

Present Mexican policies with respect to religion allegedly are based upon the constitution of 1917, promulgated at Queretaro, by a military clique, amid scenes of indescribable revelry and drunkenness. Prior governments functioned—or perhaps "were supposed to function" is the more accurate way of expressing it—under the constitution of 1857. The constitution of 1857 began with the phrase, "In the name of God and by the authority of the Mexican people." That of 1917 makes no mention of God and states in title I, chapter I, article I, "Every person in the United States of Mexico shall enjoy all the guaranties granted by this constitution." The one then, that of 1857, derived its authority from the people, that of 1917 restricted rights of the people of those granted in that instrument. The one expressive of the will of the people, the other, or present, constitutes that of a military clique, headed by Carranza and dominated by the Industrial Workers of the World.

TESTIMONY OF DR. GUTHRIE, AN EMINENT LAWYER

I am not a lawyer and I make no claim to any particular knowledge, beyond that acquired from experience in this Chamber, of constitutional interpretation. But allow me, if you will, to quote a lawyer in connection with the Mexican governmental policy with respect to the constitution of 1917, a lawyer of proven ability and legal acumen, a former president of the American Bar Association, Dr. William Guthrie.

"The Mexican Government", he wrote, "is not attempting in good faith to bring about a separation of church and state, as Americans conceive the substance of such separation, nor is it attempting merely to prevent alleged ecclesiastical intervention or interference in politics or in matters of state. On the contrary, both the Mexican Constitution and the Presidential decrees are calculated and indeed deliberately intended to bring about a more entire domination by the state over the church than has ever existed before, and to place under the absolute control and supervision of the Mexican Federal and State governments every church in Mexico, and preeminently the Catholic Church and her temples, which represents the religious faith of more than nineteen-twentieths of her population. The membership of other churches, it is understood, and counsel has been so instructed, may be reasonably asserted to be comparatively almost negligible so far as numbers are concerned, but they, of course, are equally affected and interested and will inevitably be equally subjugated and oppressed if they ever attempt to free themselves from governmental control and direction.

PROTESTANT GROUPS ARE OPPRESSED

It may be of interest to note at this point what actually has transpired with respect to some Protestant churches and institutions under current Mexican Government policy.

As late as May 15 last a Mexican Government order closed 11 Mennonital schools in the State of Chihuahua because of the refusal of Mennonite authorities to teach in these institutions doctrines of atheism and sex as required by the director of education. The Mennonites have a contract with the Mexican Government containing a guaranty of freedom of religious worship and education.

In 1926 Protestant churches were closed at Tampico, at Juarez, at Chihuahua, and at Saltillo.

In the same year, the Reverend J. D. Dale, a Baptist minister, was arrested at Tampico and deported for performing his offices as a minister of Christ on earth.

TESTIMONY OF DR. GRUENING

Dr. Ernest Gruening, now director of insular possessions and territories, in his book, Mexico and Its Heritage, relates the following from a head of a Methodist girls' school in Pachuca.

The new regulations of article 130 of the constitution mean that we no longer can teach religion in the school. Formerly we had Bible classes and a branch of the Epworth League. We have abolished both. Our boys' school, which is situated next to our church and is in charge of a Mexican teacher, had a door connecting church and school. The authorities requested us to plaster it up, and we did so.

EVIDENCE PUBLISHED BY DR. MACFARLAND

Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, regarded as one of the most influential of American Protestant clergymen, is the general secretary emeritus of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Dr. Macfarland, actuated by a desire to obtain, at first hand, the real truth concerning religious persecution in Mexico, spent considerable time there during the past year. Not content with the few "dressed up" churches in Mexico City permitted to function by governmental authorities for purposes of propaganda and for the purpose of deceiving gullible tourists, refusing to accept as conclusive information furnished by the Mexican Government, Dr. Macfarland made an honest effort to obtain the facts of the matter. The results of his observations appear in the book published June 1, Chaos in Mexico. I quote from some of his observations:

The response of the church is substantially this: The state has taken away from the worshiper the means essential to him by which, through tradition and custom established from childhood, substantiated by the impulsions of conscience, he may express his worship, confess his sins, profess his repentance, and be the recipient of divine grace. His marriage is to him a sacrament, and in the face of death he feels the need of the ministries of the church, as elements in his creed.

Not that that does not mean to me, as a Protestant, or to my Protestant readers, what it does to the plain man and woman in Mexico, and we must try to think of it in their language. I have profound respect for a sincere Catholic, and these things are essential to his religious liberty. He wants liberty to have a priest for his confession, for his sacrament, for the last rites of the dying and dead in his bereaved home. The exercise of his freedom requires the offices of church and priest. This is the "creed" of his church and of his personal religion.

The state, therefore, when it declares that the laws do not interfere with his "creed" is in grievous error.

Señor Portes, at that time President of the Republic, said on one occasion:

"I am glad to take advantage of this opportunity to declare publicly and very clearly that it is not the purpose of the constitution nor of the laws, nor of the government of the Republic, to destroy the identity of the Catholic Church or of any other, or to interfere in any way with its spiritual functions."

IS THERE PERSECUTION?—"THERE CAN BE BUT ONE OPINION"

If that is the question at issue, then there can be but one opinion. There are two matters on which, as an objective and candid narrator, I am obligated to be more than a mere fact-finder, regardless of the consequences. The state is interfering with the spiritual functions of the church and of the Catholic worshiper. The state is suppressing religious liberty when it closes the worshiper's church, when it deprives him of his priest, when it shuts out religion from his home, both as teaching and as ministration. It suppresses religious liberty to the church as an institution, not only by these same restraints but by its destruction of the church's identity and by demolition of its organization.

Article 24 of the constitution reads:

"Everyone is free to embrace the religion of his choice and to practice all ceremonies, devotions, or observances of his respective creed, either in places of public worship or at home, provided they do not constitute an offense punishable by law."

THE SOPHISTRY OF GENERAL CARDENAS

This can hardly be intended as anything but a bill of rights. But the present Government is employing the closing words of this article of the constitution as what is termed a "joker", in such a manner as to completely nullify it. Such use of the last clause as is now being made of it makes the constitution subject to the whim of every succeeding legislature. Thus, when President Cardenas declares that in religious matters the state is carrying out the constitution, all he means is that the one article which guarantees religious liberty nullifies that freedom at the same time. One can hardly conceive of anything more specious than the sophistry of the Mexican Government in this connection.

DOES THE STATE PERSECUTE RELIGION?

The next question is, Does the state persecute the church? The word "persecution", according to the dictionary, means "to pursue in a manner to injure or inflict, to harrow, to inflict cruel or oppressive treatment." Is the state injuring, inflicting, harrowing, or oppressing the church?

Is not that question answered sufficiently when I pass the beautiful cathedral and find flaming posters of the state plastered on its walls attacking it in violent terms as an institution, or when I go into a church and find it filled with cartoons, some of them vile caricatures of religion itself? Is it not answered when the Government goes into the cathedral, makes trash heaps of altars and crucifixes, and pastes seals on its paintings of the Madonnas and in the church offices on the typewriters certifying that they are the property of the Government? Is it not answered when the Red Shirts, even though not authorized, are permitted to invade church property in riotous manner? It is idle to discuss this question. Even a hasty review of this volume makes it perfectly clear that the Mexican state is persecuting the church. For the Foreign Secretary and the Ambassador to the United States to reiterate denials is as disingenuous as it is inept.

AN UNJUST ARREST

The policies of the Government are amateurish and almost childish. They are very frequently carried out with a playful sarcasm or a hilarious insolence which is entirely gratuitous. Archbishop Diaz is in every way as much of a gentleman as Señor Portes Gil, and that is saying a good deal. The archbishop's arrest on a lonely road in the middle of the night, his long detention, and the treatment which accompanied it—on the absurd charge that he was carrying a machine gun in his car—ought to have brought forth, as I expected it would, an apology from some gentleman in the Government. In my opinion, the representatives of the Mexican Government are, to say the least, poor sportsmen. Any honest and courageous referee would rule them off the floor. While there are undoubtedly sincere men in the Cabinet, there is neither sincerity nor sanity in Government procedure.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERTY HAS PERISHED

When, moreover, we come to consider the individual Mexican Catholic he has not, with relatively few exceptions, forfeited his right to liberty. The state, in its institutional attack, has made no effort whatever to preserve his freedom. It has appeared to seek retaliation rather than justice. It has been, to some degree, punishing men, and in too large measure, for the misdeeds of their more or less ancient ancestors or predecessors.

WHY DOES NOT MEXICO PUNISH THE REAL CRIMINALS?

One could also wish that the Mexican Government would express its moral indignation more frequently to those not of the church, but of the state itself, to men whose misdemeanors cry out to heaven.

The Mexican state imperils its efforts for social justice in one realm of the human social order when it does injustice in another. Even when its aims in curtailing the power of the church are right, its measures are often completely wrong on two counts—they are both unjust and unnecessary. It is a contradiction so plain that the most unlearned may see it—to tell a man he may have religious liberty while preventing him from exercising it by his own forms, rites, and ceremonies, providing these injure no one else.

A BLASPHEMOUS PUBLICATION

Cristo Rey, a newspaper previously quoted, which imitates the style of Russian journals, carries alongside its front-page title a caricature of Jesus in an apparently intoxicated condition, wearing a crown at a rakish angle, suggestive of ribaldry. When I told Señor Portes Gil that the government was charged with being responsible for the publication, he answered that the allegation was "absolutely false." I have no doubt that he thought he was telling the truth, for there is a good deal of duplicity inside state circles. The right hand of the government often does not know what the left hand is doing. As a matter of fact, however, I found that the street address named in the headline of the paper was but a sub- or pseudo-office and that the paper was printed in and issued from the official printing office of the department of agriculture. From that same office are issued some of the hideous cartoons to which reference has been made, and on its walls are posters declaring that the oppressed state of the people is due to "belief in God."

THE VOICE OF JACOB AND THE HAND OF ESAU

In his essay printed with the imprint of his Cabinet office, Señor Portes Gil does reverent homage to Jesus, refers to Him as the Master, and capitalizes the pronouns in referring to Him, appeals to the "Gospel" of Jesus, declares that "Mexico applauds" elements of "the doctrine" of the Master, while the printing presses of the department of agriculture continue to turn out another piece of literature weekly carrying a repulsive representation of Jesus on its headline. The voice sounds like that of Jacob, but the hand is that of Esau. Señor Portes Gil had assured me that the Cabinet members shared the same ideologia. Evidently this term has considerable amplitude in its circumferential area.

One can stand much of the contradictoriness of Mexican politics, but not quite to the extent of "collective" (to use the oft-employed term) whether or not the document of the Secretary of Foreign Relations is intended for consumption in the United States, while that issued from the department of agriculture is prepared for the edification of the peasants of Mexico.

Dr. Macfarland is a Protestant clergyman, and as such can be presumed to entertain no bias in favor of any particular religious group in Mexico. His testimony clearly is that of an honest observer, an observer who looked beyond the blandishments of Mexican governmental propagandists, one who pierced the veil of hypocrisy and duplicity that is held before gullible "foreign" investigators. Like all effective witnesses, Dr. Macfarland must be accepted as conclusive, because he is disinterested and honest. His testimony so far as it concerns the character of Mexican governmental religious politics is damning.

THE HABANA CONVENTION

On February 20, 1928, the Mexican Government formally ratified the Habana Convention, drawn at the Pan American Conference held in the Cuban capital. This convention contains, among other things, the following:

States must recognize in domiciled or transient foreigners in their territory all the individual guarantees which they recognize in favor of their own nationals and the enjoyment of the essential civil rights.

The Mexican Government's interpretation of this clause, as indicated by an anterior decree of March 12, 1928, is as follows:

> Aliens are under the protection of the laws and enjoy the civil rights which they (the aliens) grant the Mexicans.

All of this, mind you, is a solemn pact, an agreement between Pan American nations. It is a pledge ratified by the Mexican Nation, a solemn promise, a guaranty to protect the rights of aliens domiciled in Mexico against aggression from Mexican local authorities. And how, I ask, has the Government of Mexico observed the solemn pledges contained in this document? How has it regarded its pledges made in the congress of Pan American nations assembled at Habana in 1928?

If you entertain convictions adverse to any particular religious group or institution in Mexico, dismiss from your minds the fact that many of the clergy or religious driven from Mexico were in the category of "aliens" referred to in the Habana Pact, that many were citizens of our own country, of Spain, and of other nations. Their ouster clearly was a violation of the Habana Convention, but dismiss that phase of the matter from your minds and consider the case of the Mennonites. Consider the recent closing of their 11 schools for refusal to teach socialistic doctrines of atheism and of sex.

The Mennonites not only are "aliens" within the purview of the Habana Pact (being citizens of the United States), but they hold a contract from the Mexican Government guaranteeing them freedom of worship and freedom of educational policies. The closing of their schools is not only flouting the Havana Convention, but a violation of international law as well. The Mexican Government then stands before the bar of public opinion, the tribunal of world opinion, as a Government that regards solemn pledges to other nations as mere scraps of paper. It is a Government that stands convicted by its own acts of international duplicity. It is a Government that signs with its hand a pact of international accord while harboring in its heart the design of disregarding it.

A REGIME OF LAWLESSNESS

There have been 72 so-called "governments" in Mexico since the dawn of what masks as "independence" below the Rio Grande. Seventy-two governments, 55 of which have been headed by military men, and 12 of which only had any semblance of legal origin. The only "honest" election ever held in Mexico was that of Madero, Madero the idealist, the dreamer, who said, "I do not want to kill my people to make them good." He himself was assassinated in the treacherous and cowardly manner characteristic of Mexican political assassinations. Madero was honest and he loved his people, virtues that were out of harmony with the selfish schemes of men like Huerta, Carranza, Obregon, Calles, Morones, and others who have made the term "government by the people" a mockery in Mexico. As one writer has said, Mexico's Judases will be found in a long line of disturbers and thieves, who, for selfish ends, have made a mockery of the ballot while they appealed to the power of the sword.

Even Dr. Gruening in his great apology for Calles and his avaricious pack, Mexico and its Heritage, admits, to quote from his book:

> Effective suffrage is as much a hope deferred as at any time in Mexican history.

And in the same book, Dr. Gruening tells of his investigation to ascertain whether "justice" could be had in Mexico. He interviewed 22 of the most prominent Mexican lawyers whose conclusions were as follows:

One. That Mexico's judicial procedure needs reform.

Two. That the judiciary was not independent of the executives.

Three. That corruption existed among the judiciary.

One attorney he quotes as stating:

> There is not one judge, not one, who is not purchasable.

THE CLIQUE OF "MILLIONAIRE SOCIALISTS"

Señor Luis Morones, fat, flabby, and immensely wealthy, is the leader of the labor movement in Mexico, the man behind Calles, and the liaison man between Calles and Moscow. Comrade Morones is the friend of the workingman, as the old-fashioned politicians would put it in this country.

In his crusading for the betterment of the humble worker Señor Morones has managed to amass considerable wealth for himself, a veritable palace in the suburbs of the capital, a fleet of expensive motor cars, and live off the fleshpots of the land. But let Dr. Gruening tell you of Señor Morones. I quote from his book again:

> The head of the Mexican labor movement, Luis N. Morones, has become the man of wealth. He owns many properties, including a textile factory, though not in his own name. He lives lavishly. He sports not less than a dozen automobiles. His "whoopie" parties staged every week-end in the suburb of Tlalpam are notorious for their orgiastic extravagance. In a retreat, intended not for any considerable group of workers for the inner clique, the "grupo accion" a great steel-girded fronton court, swimming pool, bowling alleys, tennis court, and three dwellings with a retinue of servants, lift this club to a plane of luxury unequaled except by millionaires' country clubs in the United States. Comrade Monores' diamonds have become famous.

Apparently it pays well to be a member of the inner clique of the National Revolutionary Party in Mexico. The peon, the poor laborer, ekes out a bare existence on rice and beans; his savior, the great Señor Morones, who luxuriates in palaces, expensive motor cars, and diamonds. For the church to possess wealth is a crime against the state, but for Comrade Morones, for Calles, and others of the "inner clique" to amass tremendous personal fortunes—ah, that is quite another thing.

THE MIRAGE OF EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS

In his glowing account of the educational effort of the Calles administration Dr. Gruening tells of a large number of new schools that were erected, especially rural schools, and then in the next breath we read—I quote from his book once more:

> It will be noted that statistics are largely absent from this résumé of Mexico's educational endeavors. They are omitted not because of any question of their accuracy or inaccuracy but because of the ephemeral character of much of Mexico's reconstructive effort renders the data of a given moment meaningless. A school open one year may be closed the next even before the ink that described it has dried.

SO-CALLED "EDUCATION"

The Mexican revolutionist, the radical, the red, as typified by men like Calles, Morones, and the present chief executive, Cardenas, have destroyed the private schools of Mexico and that means the educational system of Mexico. What form of education have they established in its place? What is the goal, the objective of education in Mexico today as espoused by the National Revolutionary Party? In a broadcast from Guadalajara on July 19, 1934, Calles, speaking on education as outlined in the so-called "6-year plan", declared:

> It is necessary that we enter a new period of the revolution. I would call this period the psychological period of the revolution. We must enter and take possession of the consciences of the young because they do belong to the revolution.

CALLES—AN ECHO OF LENIN

I seem to recall an utterance similar to that as emanating from Soviet Russia, from Lenin or one of his disciples, in the period when anti-Christ propaganda was rampant among the Soviets.

But to search further, to probe a bit deeper, for the seed of the present Mexican educational program. Senator Padilla, secretary of the National Revolutionary Party, delivered himself of the following on October 20, 1934:

> Religion is something that is in the heart, in the convictions of men. It cannot be destroyed by brute force. It can be destroyed, if at all, only by persuasion. For this reason the Mexican revolution has made a chief instrument of its policy the diffusion of education which is eminently socialistic. Religion is to be combated with the book, by teaching and by persuasion.

Señor Padilla was not speaking alone of one particular faith. He used, you will note, the word religion and that means forms of worship revered by Catholic, Protestant, and Jew alike. It means that the Mexican Government has gone Red, gone anti-God, and is definitely committed to the policy of driving God from Mexican soil. Both of these declarations mean that the Mexican Government intends to "take hold of the conscience of the young " and instill therein the doctrines of Marx, of Lenin, and of other radicals whose disciples decry the very name of God.

And if further doubt exists, read the report of the special correspondent of the New York World-Telegram of May 6 last, who asked, at the close of a cabinet meeting and in the presence of President Cardenas, " Is Mexico headed for communism?" and received the answer from one of the Chief Executive's advisers:

It decidedly is. We are directing all of our energies toward this end.

And the further declaration of Señor Garcia-Tellez, Minister of Education:

Private property can have no place in the revolutionary scheme.

I wonder if the palatial residences of Luis Morones and the fabulous holdings of Calles and others at the head of the party are included in that category.

And then consider, if you will, the teacher's pledge, now required under the educational program:

I, before the federal board of education, solemnly declare without reservation whatsoever, to accept the program of the socialistic school and to be its propagandist and defender; I declare myself an atheist and irreconcilable enemy of the Roman Apostolic Catholic religion, and that I will exert every effort to destroy it, releasing the conscience from every religious worship, and to be ready to fight against the clergy in whatsoever field it may be necessary; also, I will not permit in my home any religious practices of any kind whatever; lastly, I will not permit any of my household to take part in any religious act whatever.

Hence, when the child enters the classroom in the morning he says: " Good morning, teacher; there is no God." The teacher replies: " Good morning, child; there never was a God."

God cannot remain in Mexico if the country is to be made over according to the plans of the National Revolutionary Party. He does not figure in them. In the schools of the State of Chihuahua are inscriptions on the walls which read, " God does not exist—never has existed."

SCHOLARLY TESTIMONY

Bishop Kelley, of Oklahoma, who spent many years in Mexico, has written a splendid book concerning the Mexican church situation entitled " Blood Drenched Altars." I should like to read an excerpt therefrom, which states the position of the church in unmistakable language:

What the church can neither stand nor tolerate is the subjection of the gospel of Christ to the spirit of the world. She can let her churches go, her schools, her plan of action in places, her very physical existence itself. She cannot let her soul go. She cannot abandon the divine mission confided to her. She neither asks nor wants to force the minds of men. But she both asks and wants the right to speak to them. She neither asks nor wants to condemn any theory unheard, but she insists that it shall not, before it has been tested, masquerade as the truth.

WHAT OF THE BORAH RESOLUTION?

On January 30 of this year Senator BORAH introduced in the Senate Resolution No. 70, which is a protest against religious persecution by the Government of Mexico and authorizes an investigation thereof by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Borah resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and to date has reposed in that committee without action. Why I cannot state. But is it not a matter of serious concern to this great Nation of ours—this Nation that is the champion of liberty and human rights—that a red dictatorship across our southern border masks as a democratic form of government, holds in ruthless subjugation, by armed force, an overwhelming majority of Christian people and ridicules the sacred name of God? Does it not concern the Government of this Nation that an unscrupulous minority below the Rio Grande is flouting the most hallowed principles of our Government, of all democratic government? If not, then the words of the immortal Lincoln—" government of the people, by the people, and for the people ", toward which our governmental strivings are directed—no longer mean anything.

THE UNITED STATES—A DEFENDER OF LIBERTY

This Nation always has been foremost among those to champion the rights of man and quick to protest against infringements thereof. Massacres of Armenians by the Turks, Jewish pogroms in Russia, and other atrocities in various parts of the world have been the subject of governmental protest. Why does the administration hold back now? Why not an official protest concerning Mexico? Is the Mexican situation any different in character than that of Armenia or of Russia?

WHY DO THE MEXICAN MILLIONAIRES FEAR THE TRUTH?

Surely the Mexican Government, with its host of propagandists here and in other parts of the Nation, should not object to an investigation.

No nation need have fear of an investigation if that nation stands on honest ground. The Mexican Government, through its attorney general, Señor Portes Gil, has issued a " white book " attempting to justify its attitude toward the church. Members of Congress, Governors of States, and others received a copy of this publication, which as a brief in support of the National Revolutionary Party was a colossal masterpiece of twisted facts, distorted evidence, and absurd argument. But the point is that in presenting it, in sending it through the mails to Senators and Representatives of the American people, the Mexican Government, in effect, was saying: " Here is our case against the Catholic Church. We are apprehensive lest you misjudge our acts against the church. We desire that you should consider our side of the case and pass it on to your people." By so doing the Mexican Government was inviting investigation by our national legislative body, was requesting the national legislative body to probe into its relations with the church. Can it demur, then, if a committee of the Senate, under authority of the Borah resolution, carries its implied desire into complete reality? Can it object to a show-down before what would prove an investigative body of civilized public opinion?

Surely, if Señor Calles, if Comrade Morones, if Attorney General Portes Gil have acted in good faith they should be happy, yes, eager to have that good faith established by the United States Senate. But have no undue apprehensions, those of you who may entertain doubts concerning the wisdom of such procedure. The National Revolutionary Party of Mexico is a creature of the shadows; of the dark, unholy, loathsome rat holes and recesses where iniquity, injustice, and murder are spawned. Like the foul, slinking, cowardly creatures of the night, it cannot stand a light of unprejudiced, honest public opinion. And because of that, it dare not face an unbiased investigative body.

THIS IS THE CAUSE OF GOD HIMSELF

The cause of God on earth is a glorious institution of yesterday—of today—of tomorrow. It will live on as a glorious institution long after the warped souls of Señor Calles and his precious henchmen have gone to their just reward. It has prevailed against Roman emperors, against the French Revolution, against the barbarous fanaticism of red Russia—and it will prevail in Mexico. For who are Calles, Morones, Cardenas, Portes Gil, and others of their ilk but little men fighting during their brief span of living against an institution whose life is eternal? And, like the revolutionists of France, of Russia, and elsewhere, they may destroy the body of the church, but they know they never can destroy its soul. They know, as does history, that the church eventually rises sphinx-like from the ashes of red conflagrations stronger and more powerful than before.

THE WORDS OF ONE OF OUR NOBLEST PATRIOTS

Mr. Speaker, permit me to conclude my remarks on this subject by a quotation from an eminent citizen, patriot, and prelate, His Eminence Patrick Cardinal Hayes. Every man, woman, and child in this great country of ours loves and respects the " Cardinal of Charity." Let his words ring in our ears this afternoon. Speaking " with charity toward all and personal animosity toward none ", in his recent pastoral letter to the people of the great archdiocese of New York, he put on record this solemn warning:

The persecution of all faiths in Mexico is "the death struggle of humanity."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JUNE 28, 1935

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be God, the Father of mercies; we come before Thee with thanksgiving. We thank Thee for the amazing providences which crowd our ways. Give us to realize the love tokens which come to us in the multitude of Thy blessings. Let the beauty of the Lord grow upon our vision, disclosing the unsearchable riches of Thy grace. "The Lord is my light and my salvation." Fulfill this blessed promise in us giving us strength of will, strength of affection, and strength of ideals. Be with us when we tread the dead level and when we go through those long reaches which depress the spirit. Each day may we walk in the contemplation of the richer knowledge of God who made us. As we go round about the circuit of our daily lives, in Thy light may we see light. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The message also announced that the Senate further insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill numbered 3 to 10, inclusive, and numbered 12 to 32, inclusive, disagreed to by the House; agrees to a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 152. Joint resolution to extend to August 31, 1935, the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 19. Concurrent resolution to amend the title of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 152) to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended.

DEATH OF LOUIS B. GOODALL

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes on a predecessor of mine, Louis B. Goodall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday at 3 o'clock p. m. Louis B. Goodall, of Sanford, Maine, departed this life. Born in Winchester, N. H., September 23, 1851, his whole life was a life of helpfulness to his fellow men. His road was the usual road of New England success—poor boy, hard work, mill worker, mill owner, head of business, high State positions, and humanitarian always. He entered this House from the First District of Maine and served two terms from 1917 to 1921, the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses. Some of you remember him as he was, an honest, helpful, whole-hearted man, who will be missed up in Maine and New England by the many he loved and helped.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I could not have supported the utilities bill as originally introduced or as it passed the Senate, and I am not sure I am going to support the bill now under consideration. It will depend somewhat on what amendments may be added to it; but whatever may be the case, I propose to offer an amendment to title II, on page 293, after line 6, relating to the jurisdiction of State power commissions.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the amendment at this point for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO TITLE II OF S. 2796

In section 318, page 293, relating to conflict of jurisdiction, there should be an additional subsection providing in effect that if a company is subject to the law or the regulation by a State commission with respect to any matter otherwise within the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission it should not be subject to the requirements of parts II or III of title II.

The following amendment would accomplish the purpose:

On page 293, after line 6, insert a new subsection in section 318, reading as follows:

"(b) If, with respect to the issue, sale, or guaranty of a security, the method of keeping accounts, the filing of reports, or the valuation, acquisition, or disposition of any security, capital assets, or facilities, or any other requirement of this part or the next preceding part, or of any rule, regulation, or order thereunder, any person is subject to the law of any State or regulation by a State commission, such person shall not be subject to the requirements of this part or the next preceding part, or of any rule, regulation, or order thereunder with respect to the same subject matter."

EXTENSION OF PLAN FOR DEPOSIT INSURANCE

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Concurrent Resolution No. 19, which is a resolution amending the title of the resolution which the House, without objection, adopted yesterday.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this just amends the title?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the distinguished Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee if this resolution is designed to replace the bill that was passed in the House here a few weeks ago? Will there be any further action taken on that bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that the resolution passed by the House on yesterday extends the temporary insurance of deposits provided for under the act of 1933, which was extended in 1934 for 1 year, or down to July 1, 1935. This resolution would extend the temporary insurance of deposits up to the 1st day of September this year. The purpose of this action is to preserve the status of this bill until the Senate shall have sufficient time to act on the banking bill passed by the House recently, to which the gentleman refers, and which embodies a plan for permanent insurance of deposits.

Mr. TRUAX. I may say to the gentleman that I think the resolution is a good one, and I have no objection; therefore I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object merely to ask a question. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that, regardless of the action on this resolution, there is a permanent law which has been passed by Congress which takes effect on July 1 that insures all deposits in banks up to $10,000?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is correct; but the resolution provides for continuing the temporary plan until the bill now pending in the Senate can be passed establishing a new permanent plan to take the place of that embodied in the act of 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was read, as follows:

Concurrent Resolution No. 19

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Senate be and he is hereby authorized and directed in the enrollment of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance provided for by section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act as amended, to amend the title thereof by striking out the words "for 1 year" and inserting in lieu thereof "to August 31, 1935."

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to consider was laid on the table.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. I wish to say to Members of the House who have been besieged with requests and inquiries regarding the matter of extension of the temporary plan for insurance of deposits that the resolution adopted by the House on yesterday and which has passed the Senate, extending the temporary insurance plan for 60 days, has a provision that relieves banks from liability to assessment during that time. The purpose of this is to prevent any lapse of insurance of such banks that do not get their insurance under the automatic provisions of the law. Congress has no jurisdiction over State banks. The State banks get their insurance under a contractual relationship. This resolution will extend that without involving the banks in delay and difficulties which might operate to bring about a lapse of the insurance during the 60 days. Members may assure those from whom they have had inquiries that the matter is now taken care of for 60 days.

GOVERNMENT SERVICE TO RECEIVERSHIP BANKS

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein some remarks made by J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is the gentleman?

Mr. KRAMER. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. RICH. What is he talking about? Does it involve data which is interesting to the Members of the House?

Mr. KRAMER. He gives some very important information which will be very valuable to the Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from the address of Hon. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, before the Michigan Bankers Association, at Lansing, Mich., on June 26, 1935:

The storm which had been gathering for several years broke in March 1933, and it was the unanimous opinion of the leaders of both political parties, as well as of the foremost men of finance in the country, that all the banks in the Nation should be closed. It will serve no useful purpose to attempt at this time to determine the causes for the catastrophe, whether world-wide, national, or local. During the 9 years prior to 1933 an abnormally large number of banks—National, State, and private—were placed in liquidation. The figures are interesting:

Calendar year	Number of banks closed	Total deposits at closing
1924	775	$210,151,000
1925	618	167,555,000
1926	976	260,378,000
1927	669	199,329,000
1928	499	142,580,000
1929	659	230,643,000
1930	1,352	853,363,000
1931	2,294	1,690,669,000
1932	1,456	715,626,000

The suspensions continued in January and February of 1933. In January 237 banks closed with $133,244,000 in deposits, and in February 150 banks closed with deposits of $63,796,000. In 9 years and 2 months, therefore, 9,685 banks were placed in liquidation with total deposits of $4,667,334,000. The Detroit banks are not included in these figures, as the two large banks in that city were not placed in receivership until May 1933. More State and National banks closed in 1931 and 1932 than in any other years in the history of banking in this country.

It was the desire of the President that only sound banks should be reopened after the banking holiday. Four thousand five hundred banks, with deposits of about $4,200,000,000, were denied licenses to conduct an unrestricted banking business. The office of the Comptroller of the Currency was charged with the responsibility of working out plans for the reopening or merging of unlicensed national banks, while the various State commissioners were charged with the same responsibility for the State institutions. The small number of bank suspensions in 1934 indicates how well the work was done. Only 57 licensed banks, with deposits of $36,793,000, were suspended. This was the smallest number of failures in 14 years. Only 1 of the 57 was a national bank, which had deposits at the time of closing in the negligible sum of $40,000. Let it be said that this bank was closed not because of poor management or irregularities but because of a drought which continued for several years in the locality.

At the close of the banking holiday in March 1933 there were placed in conservatorship 1,417 unlicensed national banks with deposits of $1,971,960,000. It is a pleasure to report to you today that there is not a national bank in conservatorship in the United States. There were placed in liquidation 290 of the unlicensed banks, with $152,387,000 in deposits. Of this amount, $57,057,121 has been repaid to depositors in these banks. In other words, of the approximately $2,000,000,000 frozen in the 1,417 unlicensed national banks at the conclusion of the banking holiday, less than 5 percent now remain unavailable to depositors, exclusive of "Spokane-plan" reorganizations.

This was the major problem confronting the office of the Comptroller. A second problem was approving the sale of preferred stock by national banks. It is not necessary to indicate to you the great amount of work in connection with this problem—conferences with local interested parties; conferences with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; preparation of proper resolutions for stockholders and boards of directors; and finally the disbursement of funds. Preferred stock in the amount of $538,378,300 was sold by 2,215 national banks, of which $62,036,970 was purchased by local parties and the balance by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In addition to the preferred stock in national banks, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation purchased preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures in State banks in the sum of $499,215,386. Some of the very strongest banks in the Nation took advantage of this plan in order to make more funds available in their communities and to avoid the necessity of calling for payment of obligations which were good but slow.

Another important problem before the Comptroller's office was the distribution of dividends to depositors in closed banks. Since March 16, 1933, the creditors of all insolvent national, District of Columbia, and State banks have received, through dividends and distributions, the aggregate sum of $663,035,985. Creditors of the 1,500 insolvent banks under the Comptroller's jurisdiction which were still in process of liquidation on June 21, 1935, have, however, received since the failures of such banks $1,045,202,977 out of a total deposit liability at closing of $1,860,318,444.

Since the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, covering the year ended October 31, 1934, 76 receiverships have been finally closed. Monthly statements are released to the press giving the names of such banks and the amount distributed to depositors and stockholders. You will be pleased to know that in 10 trusts 100 cents on the dollar was paid to depositors, and in 8 of these there was some money returned to the stockholders. During a period of 70 years, 93 cents out of every dollar collected by receivers in national banks has been returned to the depositors and 7 cents has been retained to cover the entire cost of overhead, including receivers' salaries, attorneys' fees, rent, light, heat, and all other items of expense. In the large Detroit banks a much better showing has been made, and the cost in those institutions has been less than 2 percent of the amount collected.

The disturbed economic condition of the country during recent years is reflected in a study made by the statistical department of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington. The twenty-first annual report of the Federal Reserve Board for the year 1934 contains a table of business conditions for the 7 years from 1928 through 1934. The table indicates that 1932 was the low point of the depression. Using 1923–25 as an index average of 100, industrial production for 1932 was 64 percent, factory employment was 46 percent, and freight-car loadings 56 percent. With the average for 1926 as an index of 100, wholesale commodity prices for 1932 were 65 percent. In each of these categories the figure for 1932 is lower than for any other year between 1928 and 1934. The report further states:

"In 1934 output of industrial products, including both manufactures and minerals, was at 79 percent of the 1923–25 average, as compared with 76 in the preceding year and with the low point of 64 in 1932. At the same time crop production, which had been relatively well maintained throughout the depression, showed a marked reduction as a consequence of a prolonged drought and of acreage reductions in connection with the program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Owing to higher prices received by farmers, increased marketing of livestock, and larger rental and benefit payments by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, however, total farm income was larger in 1934 than in 1933. Construction work on public projects showed a considerable increase. Profits of industrial corporations, which had recovered considerably in 1933, made further advances in 1934, and were higher than in any year since 1930. Public utility profits, however, were smaller in 1934 than in the previous year, and the deficit of railroads increased. Value of department-store sales in 1934 was 75 percent of the 1923–25 average, as compared with 67 in 1933, and other branches of retail trade also increased, particularly in rural areas."

You will be interested in some statistics pertaining to your own State. At the conclusion of the banking holiday on March 16, 1933, there were in Michigan 54 unlicensed national banks. By October 11, 1934, 44 of these banks had been reopened under old or new charters or absorbed by other banks. In the 54 unlicensed banks there were deposits of $561,521,000 at date of closing, and of this amount 68½ percent has already been returned to creditors. A large part of this release to creditors has been made possible through the use of the facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That Corporation, in addition to subscribing liberally to preferred stock in the banks which were newly organized in connection with the rehabilitation program, has granted large loans to conservators and receivers on the assets not acceptable for purchase by newly organized or existing banks. This has made possible prompt and liberal returns to creditors of the banks, and at the same time has provided for the orderly liquidation of these assets.

On December 31, 1932, there were 102 active national banks in Michigan with total deposits of $776,000,000. On March 4, 1935, there were 85 active national banks in Michigan with total deposits of $542,336,000. This is a remarkable showing, particularly in view of the fact that 54 national banks in your State with deposits of $561,521,000 were unlicensed on March 16, 1933. One of the stabilizing influences was the institution of Federal deposit insurance. The records show that on October 1, 1934, 397 banks in Michigan, with total deposits of $823,102,438 were members of the Insurance Fund. The insured deposits in these banks on that date amounted to $424,317,295.

The First National Bank of Detroit is the largest national bank which has failed in the history of the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. Its deposits at suspension were $373,360,010. The Guardian National Bank of Commerce of Detroit is the second largest national bank ever placed in the hands of a receiver. On the date of suspension, its total deposits were $108,103,045. Because of the magnitude of these two receivership banks and because they are located in your own State, some facts in connection with them will be of particular interest.

These banks closed on February 21, 1933. Conservators were appointed for each institution on March 13, 1933, and receivers were appointed on May 12, 1933. The new National Bank of Detroit was organized on March 24, 1933, and the new Manufacturers Bank of Detroit was organized on July 28, 1933, to assist in rehabilitating Detroit's banking system. Purchases of assets of both receivership banks were made by the new banks, and dividends of 30 percent were paid to the creditors of each old bank as the result of the cooperation of the new institutions. Deposits in the two new national banks had reached the sum of $399,208,381 by May 14, 1935, as compared with the total deposits of $481,463,055 in the two old banks at date of suspension.

General creditors have now been paid 70 percent by the receiver in the First National Bank, and certain secured creditors have been paid in full, making a total sum of $278,657,748 paid to date in the First National Bank. There were 548,000 accounts of $300 or less which aggregated $23,771,000. A public-spirited group of large depositors waived sufficient of their funds to permit the payment of this group in full. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation loaned the receiver $139,940,000 to expedite payments.

A group of 167 large creditors in the Guardian National Bank of Commerce waived a sufficient part of their dividends to enable the receiver to pay in full all accounts up to $1,000. The total dividends paid to the Guardian creditors amounted to 68 percent, and include amounts paid in full to the secured creditors. The sum returned to creditors of this institution is $76,661,617. There was borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the sum of $28,891,000. Approximately 130,000 accounts were paid in full, reducing the number of claims to approximately 6,000.

The pay-off of $1,000 accounts in the Guardian National Bank having been successfully consummated, the local people felt inspired to undertake a new program looking to the payment of a final dividend and the termination of the receivership. A depositors' committee, the nucleus of which was composed of those who worked out the $1,000 pay-off, was appointed, consisting of Hugh Ferry, chairman; Meyer L. Prentis, David Widman, Horace A. Davis, and B. J. Craig. At the beginning of this new program dividends had already been paid to the extent of 68 percent, and an assessment of 100 percent had been levied against the shareholders, the receiver having been enabled by a court decision in the meantime to reach the individual shareholders by going through the Guardian group, which was the nominal shareholder. Notwithstanding the magnitude of the task to be accomplished, the committee was not discouraged, but tackled it with vigor and enthusiasm. One of my deputies and two of the key men in my office were assigned to the task of working the matter out in cooperation with the receiver and the committee. It was necessary to obtain a complete and accurate appraisal of the present worth of every individual asset item, based on an estimated 5-year period of liquidation. There were approximately 20,000 of such items to be so appraised. It was also necessary to appraise the collectible value of the stock assessment as distributed through the Guardian group in the hands of between seven and eight thousand individual stockholders in almost every State in the Union and a number of foreign countries. After these appraisals were obtained and after deducting the necessary reserves for undrawn funds by creditors entitled to receive 68 percent in dividends already declared, contingent liabilities, existing obligations to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and estimated expenses, a final dividend of 19 percent was indicated. The committee then contacted the owners of the 6,000 remaining claims and obtained assignments of these claims from more than 82 percent. It is the purpose, under the plan adopted, for the receiver to borrow a sufficient additional amount of the $7,000,000 commitment from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to enable him to pay the nonassenting creditors the final dividend of 19 percent in cash. The Depositors' Corporation will then assume the existing liability to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and purchase the equity in all the remaining assets.

Another step in the procedure was the settlement of the stock assessment. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly ruled that the collection of that asset cannot be delegated or assigned to others by the Comptroller of the Currency. This asset was carefully appraised and the value of the assessment to the creditors of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce was found to be $4,000,000. A stockholders' committee, of which Mr. Hal H. Smith was chairman, undertook to obtain this amount in cash from the stockholders. It is my understanding that very few stockholders who were able to respond failed or refused to do so in some measure. Some were unable to make cash payments, but did make individual arrangements with the committee by which their deferred payments were underwritten, with the result that the committee obtained the full amount of $4,000,000 to settle the assessment liability in the Guardian National Bank of Commerce. This committee, at the same time, obtained an additional sum of $1,040,000 to be prorated according to capital among the other national banks composing the Guardian group, their stockholders being identical with the stockholders of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce. This total fund of $5,040,000 has been accepted as a cash settlement of the stockholders' liability of all of these banks at the rate of 40 percent.

All preliminary details of the plan were successfully consummated, and on April 19 the receiver filed two petitions with the Federal court in the city of Detroit. One was for authority to settle the stock assessment liability of the Guardian National Bank for the sum of $4,000,000 and the other for authority to sell the remaining assets of his trust to the Depositors' Liquidating Corporation at a price of $28,937,159.48. These petitions were accompanied by a detailed schedule showing the appraisal of all assets to be sold. The court set a date for the final hearing on April 29, and in the 10-day interval the receiver published three notices to creditors in each of the three Detroit papers that such petitions had been filed and a public hearing would be held on April 29. On the date of the hearing, which was held before Justices Tuttle and Moinet, there was no objection offered by any creditor. Two small creditors appeared, one having a claim of $3,714 and the other of $1,900, and stated they wished an explanation from the court of their rights under the plan. The consummation of this plan impressed the court so favorably that in entering the order Justice Moinet commented as follows:

"Upon consultation with my associate, we are satisfied that proofs show and the petition shows that the amount fixed for the sale here is fair and perfectly fair. The appraisal is fair, and there is absolutely no evidence of any fraud whatsoever presented or apparent. Further, that the settlement of the stockholders' liabilities, according to the record, appears to be a fair settlement, a very fair settlement, under the present circumstances and conditions. If it were necessary to bring 7,000 lawsuits against 7,000 stockholders, it would require 4 or 5 years to terminate them, and then you take your chances on whether you would be able to collect the full amount. It would cost an enormous sum of money and it would extend this receivership over a long period of time. Personally I will say that this is a very remarkable settlement; one that is unusual where you find large depositors stepping in here and foregoing their dividends so that all depositors of $1,000 or less in this bank have been paid in full and others paid 68 percent, which, with the 19 percent, is 87 percent to the depositors who do not participate in this corporation. It is very remarkable, as I view it. I think the history of the liquidation of national banks and payments to depositors shows very much less than that, a history of the bank failures in the United States. So far as I am concerned—and I am announcing for Judge Tuttle also, and he may amplify it—it is approved, and the court will sign the order."

Judge Tuttle commented: "It looks to me like a result that is only possible by the combined efforts of very many fair-minded people. You could not get a result like this except with very many people who were very fair and unselfish."

Following the approval of the court, immediate steps were taken with respect to the mechanical details incident to the sale of assets, the procurement of the additional loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the payment of the final cash dividend of 19 percent to the nonassenting creditors. The contract between the receiver and the purchasing Corporation has been executed, and the final dividend will be distributed by the receiver at an early date.

In these two large institutions approximately 678,000 accounts have been paid in full. It is not necessary to call your attention to the magnificent work done by the receivers and their assistants, the attorneys, and my assistants in Washington. Ever since the days immediately following the banking holiday we have been deluged with thousands of letters and hundreds of telegrams about these Detroit banks; a number of committees and many individuals came to Washington to discuss with us the problems of these two banks. It required the highest degree of patience and the greatest good nature on the part of all to handle a situation fraught with so many conflicting interests and cross-currents.

The cooperation of the people of Detroit, their forbearance, and the confidence of the great majority of them that somehow the situation would work out all right in the end were a real inspiration to us. The kindly spirit planted in your soil more than 300 years ago by the French missionaries still lives. The lessons taught by Father Marquette have not been forgotten, and his high purposes still influence a great people. No city suffered more than Detroit, no people rose to greater heights than those of Michigan as they passed out of the shadow of the depression into the sunlight of a new day. It has been a privilege and a pleasure to have had a small part in helping to solve some of the problems of your people, and in the fires of conflict, eternal chains of friendship have been forged.

AN APPEAL TO CONGRESS TO SAVE TAXPAYERS FROM A TREASURY RAID

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a letter I addressed to the President in opposition to a Treasury raid under the name of the so-called "officers-promotion bill" for the Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, as I entered the Army at the age of 17 years, and have been actively in the service or interested in the betterment of the service since 1898, I feel that I am qualified to speak in reference to S. 1404, the so-called "officers' promotion bill", which could, more properly, be termed, "A Treasury raid of the first magnitude."

I actively served with many of the officers so generously provided for in the so-called "promotion bill" and as I have the highest regard for them, I am satisfied in my heart that these gentleman are not "pay-triots" and that they themselves would disapprove of legislation of this kind at this time, provided they understood the desperate plight of our citizens, as do the various Representatives. I cannot conceive that any true American, adequately provided for, would ask for more for himself at this time if he knew, from personal experience and from correspondence, the tragic situation of so many of our worthy citizens, many of whom are existing on $20 or less per month of Government relief or dole.

The officers of the Army have not lost a day's pay from the time they were commissioned. The most of them occupy free palatial quarters in modern Army posts, in which light and fuel are furnished them free of charge. Purchasing at the commissary, quartermaster, and post-exchange stores, their living costs are thus further reduced approximately 10 to 40 percent below those of the average civilian. With no rent to pay, with their quarters taken care of by enlisted men, and even house work, in many instances, performed by enlisted men, it is my sincere belief that, with their present pay, they are well provided for and that the so-called "promotion bill", which will entail a potential cost to the taxpayers of $100,000,000 to $300,000,000 during the life of the officers, is unjustified at the present time.

In addition to the benefits of free quarters, free service from enlisted men, and reduced cost of living, they receive free medical and dental care for themselves and their families, including dependents.

The pay and subsistence allowance of an Army captain, with 18 years' service, is $379 per month. We should compare the benefits of free quarters with free upkeep, decided savings in purchasing of subsistence, clothing, and so forth, free medical and dental care, and this high monthly pay of $379 per month, with the approximate pay of $100 per month only which, according to press reports, is the average pay received by at least one-third of the high-school principals of the State of Virginia. From this insignificant pay of $100 per month, these principals of high schools must subsist themselves and their families at regular subsistence charges, and in addition, they must pay for their own quarters and bear the expense of any medical and dental treatment which they and their families may require. Including the allowances to a captain in the Army, with 18 years' service, he receives at least five times more total compensation than do one-third of the high-school principals in the State of Virginia!

Senate bill 1404 would create 1,412 additional officers of field rank. The Army is already top heavy with these higher ranking officers and in many instances known to me personally, apparently because of the fact that there is no adequate command for the surplus of high-ranking officers now in the Army, officers receiving $600 per month are performing duties heretofore performed by second and first lieutenants. Why, then, should 1,412 additional field officers be created?

It should be borne in mind that the maximum pay for these field officers is $534.20 per month, plus free palatial quarters, free fuel and light, free medical and dental service for themselves and families, free service of enlisted men for upkeep of quarters, and, in addition, savings of from 10 to 40 percent to them in the purchase of their necessary supplies. My experience as an enlisted man and as an officer, and my activities in civil life and as a Congressman, warrant the candid assertion (which I will not amplify at this time), that field officers in the Army, in time of peace, hold a sinecure par excellence.

I contend that to increase the rank of these officers (an increase in rank means an increase in pay and allowances), at this time, with so much distress in our Nation is discriminatory in the highest degree and an unjustified raid on the Treasury because these gentlemen are already well provided for and from the standpoint of patriotism, they can well wait for further consideration until the Nation is on the road to recovery. Officers of the Army receive an increase of 5 percent in their pay every 3 years and in addition, many of them have received increases in rank, thus, in some instances, doubling their increase in compensation since they were commissioned. The condition of these officers is no different today than it was in 1926, in the heyday of our prosperity. Why should we now add to the burden of the taxpayers by giving increased rank with higher pay and allowances to these gentlemen while millions of our worthy citizens have been bereft of a job for years and have had no income except such as has been extended to them through governmental relief?

It should be borne in mind that those whom we are seeking to retire after 15 years of service are just now, or should be, at the zenith of their efficiency. To retire an able-bodied individual after 15 years' service just to make promotion and increased pay possible for some others who were commissioned subsequently to him is utterly indefensible, in my opinion, and defeats the very principle of efficiency in the service. Why should able-bodied officers be retired after 15 years of service, at high retired pay for the balance of their lives, many of them to compete with the unemployed in civil life, thus reducing the opportunities of our already-underprivileged class? Such retirement of able-bodied officers with 15 or more years of service at $149 to $362.50 per month for the balance of their lives would be favoritism of the worst type, and I hope that Representatives in the House will not permit S. 1404 to be disposed of under unanimous consent.

I am also appealing to the Speaker not to recognize anyone to consider Senate bill 1404 under suspension of the rules. If this measure—Senate bill 1404—has any merit, it should be presented to the Rules Committee and, if favorably considered, enacted into law under the regular procedure applied to other legislation.

I hope my colleagues will read the following letter which I addressed to the President of the United States on this subject and that they will cooperate with me in requesting that Senate bill 1404 be not favorably reported by the Rules Committee, but that if it is favorably reported, sufficient time for debate and amendment be given to the memberhip:

JUNE 26, 1935.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In the interest of the taxpayers and the balancing of the Budget, may I call your attention to Senate 1404, the so-called "officers' promotion bill", which was reported favorably to the House yesterday?

As a retired enlisted man with a background of military experience since 1898, I feel that the enactment of this legislation at this time is absolutely uncalled for.

In the administration of your predecessor, Mr. Hoover, as a matter of economy, it was proposed to discharge 2,000 officers from the service. This proposal was seriously considered and almost approved.

Inasmuch as our Democratic platform urges a reduction of 25 percent in the cost of government, and in view of the fact that the enactment of S. 1404 would mean a potential annual increase in the tax burden of the people in an amount between $9,000,000 and $12,000,000, I am hopeful that you will not approve of the enactment of this legislation at this time.

May I emphasize the fact that millions of families in this country have had no income for the past 5 years and additional millions of families have had only a partial income? The officers who are so munificently provided for in S. 1404 have had a constant, regular income since 1920. In addition, they have received increases in pay due to longevity; and there is no necessity at the present time, in my opinion, to burden the taxpayers with the costs of additional high rank and other benefits to this group.

In the interest of the taxpayers and our unfortunate unemployed, I am opposed to unnecessary expenditures from the Public Treasury for the benefit of individuals already well taken care of; and it is for this basic reason that I especially appeal to you, in the interest of economy, not to approve of this raid on the Treasury.

You are a very busy man and cannot recall every issue, but under the economy act approximately 5,000 emergency officers—with service-connected disabilities—were removed from the retired list because of the "causative factor." Under S. 1404, 4,500 or more officers, in perfect physical condition, will be eligible for retirement at an average pay of approximately $170 to $195 per month for the balance of their lives. This, Mr. President, is also another reason why, in justice to the World War disabled officers, legislation of this type should not be enacted.

The further provision in S. 1404 that approximately 1,500 officers be advanced to field rank, where the maximum pay and allowances amount to $600 per month is also a raid on the Treasury. Many of these officers today, to my personal knowledge, are performing duties which a sergeant could perform with the same degree of efficiency, provided he were authorized to administer oaths and sign official papers.

I reiterate that S. 1404 is nothing other than a Treasury raid, as it will pad the retired list with able-bodied officers to be a drain on the National Treasury for the balance of their lives.

Hoping you will consider this in a spirit of cooperation and for the best interests of our Nation, I am, with best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

J. H. HOEPPEL.

T. V. A. OPPOSED BY REPUBLICANS

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak today on the minority report of H. R. 8632, the most recent T. V. A. bill, and the one reported out by the Military Affairs Committee, of which I am a member.

I desire to quote first one sentence of the minority report:

> We do not now, nor have we ever, subscribed to the philosophies of government upon which the act now sought to be amended was based, and, therefore, would be opposed to the passage of the original measure were it before the House of Representatives today.

This is the whole issue; and we are either for or against the T. V. A. Therefore, let us not enact a halfway measure. Let us either let it live or kill it.

Yes; this minority, representing the Republican Party, reports that they are absolutely opposed to the philosophy behind the T. V. A.; they are, therefore, opposed to conservation of water and land resources, the prevention of soil erosion, reforestation, of an investment by the Government paying for itself, and all these activities which are a benefit to the country as a whole.

But let me answer some of the specific statements that the minority report makes. They say that the conclusion is justified—

> That without requisite authority, the Tennessee Valley Authority has exceeded the power delegated to it, and now seeks by this legislative proposal to validate the illegal acts it has committed, the power it has usurped, and at the same time obtain additional powers to extend its activities beyond anything that Congress ever intended or had the power to convey.

Let us see in what specific respects does this minority report charge that T. V. A. has exceeded its authority under the existing law:

They say that T. V. A. was to be financed by $50,000,000 bond issue, authorized under its act. They fail to observe that T. V. A. under this authorization can only issue bonds for certain limited power purposes. They charge that the corporation has "dipped into very nearly every source of revenue provided for emergency relief"; they refer to $50,000,000 obtained in this fashion under the N. I. R. A. in 1933, and $25,000,000 under the Emergency Appropriation Act in 1934. These funds, however, were directly appropriated for the T. V. A. by specific acts of Congress, mentioning the corporation by name, as the minority Members would have discovered had they referred to the acts of June 16, 1933, and June 19, 1934. Other appropriated sums which they charge the T. V. A. has received were never received by that corporation.

The report charges that "without authorization from Congress" T. V. A. has proceeded, or is about to proceed, with the construction of six dams. T. V. A. is at present constructing only three dams—Norris, Wheeler, and Pickwick Landing. Section 4–J of the act expressly authorizes the T. V. A. dam construction in the following language: "The corporation shall have power to construct dams", and so forth, "in the Tennessee River and its tributaries." Moreover, in the building of its dams, the corporation has always fully disclosed its plans and recommendations for funds for carrying them out to the Appropriations Committee, as reference to the proceedings of that committee would have disclosed. The T. V. A. has never withheld any knowledge from anybody.

They charge that the T. V. A. has failed to make reports to Congress. The true facts are that the T. V. A. has made two formal written reports, one of these being a 60-page document, submitted to the Congress in December of 1934, and the other a progress report transmitted by the President. Each year responsible officers of the corporation have likewise presented detailed reports in appropriation hearings. Hundreds of pages of testimony of the T. V. A. directors before the Military Affairs Committee and Appropriations Committee have given a complete and comprehensive picture of its work.

It is clear from the foregoing that the T. V. A. has in no respect exceeded its authority as charged by the minority report. In this connection, I want to refer to the report of the Committee on Appropriations submitted to the House last week:

> There has been criticism of the (T. V. A.) Board for some of its actions under the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. The law under which T. V. A. is operating is broad and requires the members of the Board to believe in the purposes and policies expressed in it.
> The committee believes the Board to be sincere and earnest in endeavoring to carry out the law.

The minority report makes certain other entirely unfair charges. They say that "in spite of constitutional limitations", the T. V. A. "conceived the idea" that it has "been appointed for the primary purpose" of promoting "public ownership" of electric utilities. Nothing could be further from the truth. In its electric operations the corporation is merely carrying out the expressed mandate of the Congress, repeatedly stated in the T. V. A. Act, that in the sale of its power preference should be given to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit cooperatives. The report further says that the T. V. A. realizes that there is no market for its power and that it has therefore determined upon a program of destructive competition amounting to confiscation of private utilities. In the first place, in view of the threatened power shortage for the Tennessee Valley, forecast in the recent report of the Federal Power Commission, supported by recent statement of the National Association of Electrical Manufacturers, it is clear that the market for power is more than ample. Indeed, a critical power shortage will develop unless new sources of power are found. A sufficient answer to the charge of confiscation may be found in the fact that T. V. A. operations have not hurt but have helped the private utilities in this region. The greatest increase in business prosperity of private power companies in the entire United States has taken place in the area of the T. V. A. since the Authority began operations.

One other charge requires comment: That T. V. A. has neglected the fertilizer aspects of its program. As to this it suffices to point out that large quantities of an improved fertilizer are being manufactured by the corporation at Muscle Shoals and are being distributed to hundreds of farms.

I should like to add also that during the many weeks of the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee, when the directors were subjected to questioning more appropriate to the police court, or the Inquisition, than to congressional proceedings, we were impressed not only by the three directors' patience and forthrightness but also by the fact that they were conscientiously endeavoring to conform to the letter and spirit of the T. V. A. Act in every particular.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL SITUATION IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to certain bills which have been introduced in the Congress with respect to Puerto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I feel that it is my duty to include herewith certain letters and documents for the information of the Members of Congress with respect to the economic and social situation in Puerto Rico, and also to make reference to certain bills which have been introduced in Congress relative thereto.

H. R. 8621, introduced by Mr. KOCIALKOWSKI, entitled, "A bill to provide that funds allocated to Puerto Rico under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 may be expended for permanent rehabilitation, and for other purposes", presents three distinct aspects:

(a) Establishment of a special revolving fund, including the proceeds of the disposition of property acquired, a fund that will be available without any limitation of time contained in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935.

(b) Specific authority to include the acquisition, development, maintenance, and operation of agricultural and industrial properties and enterprises.

(c) Establishment of an insurance fund to insure individual agriculturists in Puerto Rico.

Purpose (a) the establishment of a special revolving fund to be available beyond the time limitations contained in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 will be beneficial to the interests of the island as then sufficient time will be given to properly develop the several reconstruction projects, such as rural electrification, slum clearance, highway construction, and rural rehabilitation. The present time limit will only allow a period of 2 years for carrying into effect this vast program, and considering the fact that a new and complete machinery for its administration has to be set up, and owing to the fact that up to this date, in contrast with rehabilitation projects in continental United States where same have been going on for last 2 years, nothing of this nature has been done in the island, a 2-year period is too limited, and if all the different projects would be crowded in such a short period, there will surely be a great waste of money and effort and probably a grand economic failure.

Purpose (b) gives special authority to include the acquisition, development, maintenance, and operation of agricultural and industrial properties and enterprises. The object of this special authority is obvious; it tries to authorize those clauses or recommendations dealing with the purchase of establishments to be operated by means of a public corporation and used as a possible yardstick in the sugar-production business.

This clause goes way beyond the power vested in the President of the United States by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935.

The act, section 5, states:

> In carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution the President is authorized (within the limits of the appropriation made in section 1) to acquire, by purchase or by the power of eminent domain, any real property or any interest therein, and improve, develop, grant, sell, lease (with or without the privilege of purchasing), or otherwise dispose of any such property or interest therein.

As we may clearly see, the Congress of the United States saw fit to authorize the President to "acquire, improve, develop, grant, sell, lease, or otherwise dispose" of property, but not to operate any such business or enterprises as is requested in this bill.

It is our belief that the organic act, which is the constitution of the island, gives our insular government powers enough to put in operation any and all measures for the reconstruction of the island without placing a supergovernment over and above our regular government institutions.

Our legislature, or executive branch, are in a position, with all recognized authority within the law, to establish and develop and coordinate the work with any measure or plan of rehabilitation, all within the legal prerequisite of an organized community.

[H. R. 8621, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to provide that funds allocated to Puerto Rico under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 may be expended for permanent rehabilitation, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That all sums which the President has segregrated or allotted or shall segregate or allot for projects in Puerto Rico, out of the money appropriated by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, shall constitute a special fund to provide relief and work relief and to increase employment in Puerto Rico. The fund thus established shall continue available for expenditure until June 30, 1940. All income derived from operations financed out of this fund and the proceeds of the disposition of property acquired therewith shall constitute a revolving fund which shall remain available for expenditure for the purposes and in manner authorized herein and in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 until Congress shall provide otherwise, notwithstanding any limitation of time contained in the said Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935. Any agency or agencies lawfully designated or established to administer funds allotted hereunder or the revolving fund herein authorized may be continued so long as the said funds or any of them remain available for expenditure.

Projects for rural rehabilitation in Puerto Rico may include the acquisition, development, maintenance, and operation of agricultural and industrial properties and enterprises. A reasonable charge may be made for materials and services produced or made available by any project: Provided, That such materials and services may also be supplied as compensation, in whole or in part, for services rendered by persons employed upon any project.

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 15 (f) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act as amended by section 8 of the act of May 9, 1934, or any action taken thereunder, all or any part of the unobligated balance of taxes heretofore or hereafter collected from the processing of sugar beets or sugarcane in Puerto Rico and/or upon the processing in continental United States of sugar produced in or coming from Puerto Rico are hereby authorized, in the discretion of the President, to be transferred to the revolving fund authorized by this act. Not exceeding $10,000,000 of this fund may, in the discretion of the President, be set aside in the Treasury for use as an insurance fund to insure individual agriculturists in Puerto Rico, but to the extent only of such insurance fund and its accretions against damage by hurricane to their farm dwellings and farm buildings; growing crops; plants and trees, including trees used as shade for growing crops; warehouses; and produce in barns and warehouses: Provided, That said funds may be so employed only during such periods as the Secretary of the Interior shall find and determine that commercial insurance is not available, or, if available, only at rates impractically high, and policies of insurances shall be issued hereunder only pursuant to such terms and premium rates as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe by regulations duly promulgated. Until otherwise provided by law all moneys collected as premiums on such insurance or otherwise in connection with the administration of such fund or the operation of such insurance activity shall constitute accretions to the fund and shall be held, together with the original insurance fund and all additions thereto, as a revolving fund for the purposes of such insurance.

The Interdepartmental Committee on Puerto Rico—composed of Messrs. Oscar L. Chapman, Assistant Secretary of the Interior as chairman; W. I. Myers, Governor of the Farm Credit Administration; Rexford G. Tugwell, Under Secretary of Agriculture; and Jacob Baker, assistant administrator, Federal Emergency Relief Administration—has rendered a very voluminous and comprehensive report on the proposals of the Puerto Rico Policy Commission for the economic rehabilitation of the island, commonly called the "Chardon plan."

Representatives of three Federal Departments: Department of Agriculture, Federal Emergency Relief Administration, and Farm Credit Administration were sent to Puerto Rico to make a thorough study of the technical feasibility of the proposed plan and to make substitute proposals where necessary.

The report divides the plans proposed by the Puerto Rico Policy Commission in two groups of projects—a plan for the purchase of sugar lands and sugar mills by the United States Government and their operation by Puerto Ricans by means of a public corporation, project for subsistence homesteads and a hotel.

The report concurs with the assumption that there is need for a unified program for thorough economic rehabilitation on the island but considers that the difficulties of farmers and laborers in competition with the corporation economy is far more complex than is realized by the authors of the proposed plans.

The report is completely at odds with many of the assumptions and recommendations of the proposed plan as follows: That the sugar industry is not a basic difficulty and that on the contrary is the one industry least in need of immediate rehabilitation, that the sugar phases of the plan proposed could not be operated without heavy losses in the net income of the people of the island and that the mass of the people will not be benefited. The conclusions of said report are as follows:

THE INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON PUERTO RICO

Oscar L. Chapman, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, chairman.
W. I. Myers, Governor, the Farm Credit Administration.
Rexford G. Tugwell, Under Secretary of Agriculture.
Jacob Baker, Assistant Administrator, Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

The Interdepartmental Committee on Puerto Rico in July 1934 assigned representatives of three Federal departments, hereafter referred to as "the technical committee", to go to Puerto Rico and report on the proposals of the Puerto Rico Policy Commission for the Economic Rehabilitation of the Island, commonly called the "Chardon plan."

This committee was asked to study the technical feasibility of the plan, and to make substitute proposals where necessary.

The Chardon plan includes two groups of projects. The first is chiefly a plan for the purchase of sugar lands and sugar mills by the United States Government, and their operation by Puerto Ricans, by means of a public corporation. It also includes a project for subsistence homesteads, and a plan to buy and operate the Condado Hotel.

With the basic assumption of the Chardon plan, that there is need for a unified program for thorough ecnomic rehabilitation on the island, there is no disagreement. The technical committee finds, however, that the central economic problem, the difficulties of farmers and workers in competition with the corporation economy, is far more complex than is realized by the authors of the Chardon plan.

The committee has tried, first, to trace this larger economic problem; second, to indicate which remedies will give farmers and workers lasting aid; and, third, to define the administrative farmers by which these remedies can be put promptly into operation.

Part I of the attached report discusses the operating problem of the Chardon sugar program, and the question whether or not the carrying out of this program as proposed would add to the income of Puerto Rico or benefit the bulk of the population on the island.

Remaining sections of the report present an integrated program for rehabilitation of coffee and other agricultural industries; reemployment, reeducation, and health work for agricultural labor; and improvement of the economic agencies serving agriculture.

The personnel of the technical committee included Julius Matz, plant pathologist and specialist in sugarcane production, Department of Agriculture; T. R. Snyder, industrial engineer, Federal Emergency Relief Administration; and Edna Lonigan, economist, Farm Credit Administration.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

1. The sugar industry is not a basic difficulty in the immediate situation.

A. Sugar is the one industry least in need of immediate rehabilitation.

B. The sugar phases of the plan proposed by the Puerto Rico Policy Commission could not be operated without heavy losses in the net income of the islanders.

C. The sugar phases of the plan are humanitarian in origin, not economic. They would benefit the Puerto Rican landholders and the professionals, not the mass of Puerto Rican people.

D. The basic difficulty in Puerto Rico is not the alienation of land and unequal distribution of income, but absolute low income. This is due to:

(1) Continuous removal of surplus income from the island.
(2) Deterioration in quality of land, seeds, and animal stocks.
(3) Decline in health and energy of the people.
(4) Complete absence of a middle class strained in the arts that make labor productive.
(5) Overemphasis on politics.
(6) Increase in population out of all proportion to the increase in economic opportunities.

2. Rehabilitation of the coffee industry is the first essential.

A. To raise the total income of the island.

B. To restore normal employment.

C. To remove people from the cities and reduce the slum population.

D. To aid in conserving the forests and the water supply.

3. Coffee rehabilitation requires the following steps:

A. Improvement of the chemical and mechanical condition of the soil.

B. Replanting of coffee trees, adequately spaced, etc.

C. Replanting of tall trees to provide not shade, but diffused sunlight.

D. Crop diversification, including planting of food crops, and raising of meat animals.

E. Drastic reduction of debts to fit actual income-producing capacity of farms.

4. Other lands also need similar rehabilitation in less degree.

A. Crops, e. g., tobacco, citrus fruits, cotton.

B. One million acres of uncultivated lands.

5. The basic problem is to organize the labor supply in a way which will—

A. Provide the labor needed for rehabilitation of coffee farms, for slum clearance, etc.

B. Provide the supervision which will insure a higher quality of work than the farmers of Puerto Rico can at present provide.

C. Provide training for the workers in the useful arts and trades, through work and habit, not through exhortation.

D. Reduce the financial burden of relief and the danger of loss of self-reliance.

6. It is necessary also greatly to increase the effectiveness of the economic agencies on which agriculture is dependent.

A. Improved marketing and credit facilities.

B. Cooperation.

C. Hurricane insurance.

D. Transportation network to collect farm crops.

7. There are two agencies on the island now operating, which are very well fitted to carry out most of the necessary reforms.

A. The Hurricane Relief Commission, under its present director, Col. F. J. Behr, is the agency most thoroughly familiar with the physical and scientific side of agriculture and especially of coffee farming.

B. The Farm Credit Administration knows thoroughly the economic and credit side.

C. Together they have the knowledge and the operating organization to put farming in Puerto Rico on a paying basis, and at the same time to restore the unemployed slum dwellers of San Juan to a stable economic position in the hills from which they came.

D. There is far less risk in using these two well-organized agencies than in setting up a new and untried system which must lose months before it is ready to go.

8. The changes needed to begin rehabilitation with the use of these two agencies are very few.

A. Their present direction is extraordinarily effective.

B. They need additional personnel and funds which can be supplied from the sugar processing tax, and by allotment of some of the relief funds.

C. The director of hurricane relief may need to be specially designated as director of agricultural relief, pending the more formal change of the hurricane relief commission into the agricultural relief commission.

D. The two agencies can operate under the new corporation or independently, if the chartering of the corporation meets with difficulty.

9. The Administrator for agricultural relief can begin immediately the organization of the unemployed into units on the principle of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

A. With the C. C. C. teams it will be possible to start immediately the physical rehabilitation of coffee farms and idle lands.

B. The C. C. C. program will permit the return of large numbers of workers to agricultural labor in the hills, which have been filling the city slums since the hurricane, and raising the death rate from tuberculosis.

C. The C. C. C. organization will provide the necessary training program for the workers, under the best technical direction.

D. With C. C. C. workers it will be possible to meet the much-reduced problem of slum clearance and rebuilding.

E. With C. C. C. organization it will be possible promptly to set up industrial units to provide supplies for agricultural rehabilitation and the like—all under adequate technical management and control.

Emphasis in developing the industrial program would be on provision of wage work for men, and nonwage work for women, such as animal husbandry, home processing of foods, and the like.

(1) The wage work provided for women on the island tends to draw women into the labor market faster than it supplies them with jobs.

(2) The wage work for men involves more difficult problems of organization and so needs a longer period of incubation.

(3) The women provide a disproportionately large share of the cash income of the family in Puerto Rico.

10. The C. C. C. program provides a new technique for the readjustment of adults in an economic society that is subject to rapid change.

A. Improvement in physical health and morale.

B. Education in farming, finance, marketing, and cooperation, based on habit and practical situations, not on exhortation and intellect, including use of dramatic-picture methods for adult reeducation.

11. With the C. C. C. organization it will be possible to give the workers a stable place in the economic system by developing a subsistence homstead program that has some real hope of success.

A. The C. C. C. furnishes a means to select the men best qualified for success at homesteading, based on a real knowledge of their character and ability.

B. The C. C. C. can train the men and women in good farming methods and care of animals before they are put on the land.

C. The C. C. C. units can put the land into the best possible physical condition, such that it can produce good crops.

D. The Agricultural Relief Commission can organize the village communities for each settlement.

E. It can prepare the workers for the cooperative relationships of such a community by participation, not exhortation.

12. The Farm Credit Administration, given additional funds and personnel, can begin the improvements in the marketing and credit machinery of the island, so that farmers and workers can get a fair return for their labor.

This is equivalent to providing an adequate spread to cover actual costs of credit and marketing in a high-risk area, in place of the arbitrary narrow margin now allowed by law.

13. The insular health department now has agencies which, with some additional funds, can expand the work of race improvement on the island.

A. To improve the feeding of infants, especially through the second year.

B. To give educational advice to mothers so they can continue nursing their infants.

C. To expand the work of providing prenatal examination and treatment of mothers.

14. The Relief Administration can shift entirely to the difficult problems of social work, with no further responsibility for the economic and engineering problems of reemployment or industrial development.

15. Only three new agencies need be set up. They are all fairly simple in structure.

A. Farm debt conciliation committee.

(1) To reduce farm indebtedness.

(2) To develop a permanent land policy.

B. Homestead and land purchase commission—to buy, hold, and distribute homestead sites.

This is really a board assisting the Director of Agricultural Relief.

C. Hurricane insurance commission—to promote nonprofit insurance on the same basis as compensation insurance in New York State.

16. An interdepartmental committee for Federal agencies should be set up to deal with problems concerning more than one Federal department. They can adjust those differences of opinion that should be decided on the island, and not referred to men with heavy responsibilities 1,700 miles away.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

The President signed an Executive order establishing the Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration to carry out in a coordinate way all reconstruction work in Puerto Rico under the emergency relief appropriation of 1935.

He designated Ernest H. Gruening as administrator. The reconstruction administration approved projects for Puerto Rico on the basis of a program that has been formulated.

To avoid overlapping of activities of the P. R. E. R. A. and the normal duties of the insular government and to coordinate their respective functions, members will form a coordinating committee. This committee will be headed by the Governor of Puerto Rico, and will consist of the Governor, as chairman. Of course, so far the thought contained in the foregoing statement has not been carried out.

There will be members selected by him from the executive and legislative branches of the insular government and an equal number designated by the Reconstruction Administration.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE PUERTO RICO RECONSTRUCTION ADMINISTRATION

By virtue of and pursuant to the authority vested in me under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, approved April 8, 1935 (Public Resolution No. 11, 74th Cong.), I hereby establish an agency within the Department of the Interior to be known as the "Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration", and appoint Ernest E. Gruening as Administrator thereof, to serve without additional compensation.

I hereby prescribe the following functions and duties of the said Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration to be exercised and performed by the Administrator thereof:

To initiate, formulate, administer, and supervise a program of approved projects for providing relief and work relief and for increasing employment within Puerto Rico.

In the performance of such duties and functions, expenditures are hereby authorized for necessary supplies and equipment; law books and books of reference, directories, periodicals, newspapers, and press clippings; travel expenses, including the expense of attendance at meetings when specifically authorized by the Administrator; rental at the seat of government and elsewhere, purchase, operation, and maintenance of passenger-carrying vehicles; printing and binding; and incidental expenses; and I hereby authorize the Administrator to accept and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, and with the consent of the local government of Puerto Rico, such local officers and employees, and appoint without regard to the civil-service law such officers and employees as may be necessary, to prescribe their duties and responsibilities, and without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, fix their compensation: Provided, That insofar as practicable, the persons employed under the authority of this Executive order shall be selected from those receiving relief.

To that extent necessary to carry out the provisions of this Executive order the Administrator is authorized to acquire by purchase or by the power of eminent domain any real property or any interest therein and improve, develop, grant, sell, lease (with or without the privilege of purchasing) or otherwise dispose of any such property or interest therein.

Allocations will be made hereafter for the administrative expenses of the Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration and for authorized projects.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

FEBRUARY 20, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMMISSIONER IGLESIAS: I have learned, with interest, of the action of the Puerto Rican Senate in resolving by a unanimous vote to request me to cause quo warranto proceedings against the Eastern Sugar Associates to be instituted, and that this message has been sent to you by the Honorable Rafael Martinez Nadal, president of the Senate of Puerto Rico.

I am happy to inform you that on January 4 instructions were sent to the Governor of Puerto Rico to order the attorney general to proceed to bring a quo warranto against the Eastern Sugar Associates for violation of the joint resolution of May 1, 1900.

I also note the Senate's recommendation that similar proceedings be instituted against other entities which have likewise acted in violation of the act of Congress of May 1, 1900, prohibiting the holding of lands in excess of 500 acres. I think we may safely assume that the Government's action against the Eastern Sugar Associates will aim to establish a precedent to be followed thereafter.

Likewise, I note the request of the Puerto Rican Senate that in these proceedings special attorneys be appointed who are in sympathy with the intent which inspired the Senate of Puerto Rico to approve said resolution. This matter will have my consideration.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES.

The Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, issued the following press release which in effect is the following:

As far back as 1900, Congress approved a resolution limiting land ownership by agricultural corporations in Puerto Rico to 500 acres of land. This limitation also is embodied in the present Organic Act of Puerto Rico, enacted by Congress and approved March 2, 1917. The purpose of the resolution is clear in itself, and is rendered clearer by debates it occasioned in Congress in 1900.

Puerto Rico is a small agricultural and overpopulated island. The soil is the basic security of its population. This system of intolerable exploitation, the concentration of land into the hands of limited ownership, must be avoided, especially an absentee ownership. For 35 years this law of Congress has been a dead letter. What Congress in its wisdom wished to avoid is exactly what has happened. Most of the good soil in Puerto Rico today is in the hands of a few large corporations, predominantly absentee owners. Under past administrations, Puerto Rico has become more and more a factory-plantation system, worked by landless peons, consequently taxpayers on the continent are called upon to foot bigger and better bills for unavoidable, yet socially unsound, relief.

The Department of the Interior is whole-heartedly supporting the policy established by Congress 35 years ago to decentralize land holding by huge corporate entities in Puerto Rico. It is to be hoped that, since this policy has the overwhelming approval of the Puerto Rican people, it will speedily be put into effect. The Department of the Interior will vigorously pursue its course on the basis of the congressional enactment, which up to now has been a dead letter, and we are confident that all interests in Puerto Rico will cooperate.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1935.

STATEMENT OF HON. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, RESIDENT COMMISSIONER OF PUERTO RICO, ON H. R. 1394

Commissioner IGLESIAS. I know that you have not the time this morning to permit me to take all the time needed to make as important a statement as should be made in view of the declarations just made by Senator Muñoz Marin and the statement of Senator Barceló, and especially that which was made by the representative of the American Legion, Mr. Harry Hall. The impression, it seems to me, is not as accurate as it should be.

The CHAIRMAN. The impression is not accurate?

Commissioner IGLESIAS. Not as accurate as it should be in view of the true conditions of the people of Puerto Rico. In the first place, I want to state here that the social and economic troubles which we have in Puerto Rico are just the same troubles as those you may find in many communities of the States of the Union.

In regard to the problems of the big corporations with their absentee owners, exploiting not only the masses of the workers but the small landowners, it is true that state of affairs exists in the same way as that which you know has existed in many States of the Union. Those particular problems, which are economic in character, are the results of the system that has been going on for years and years, not only in the United States but in Puerto Rico and elsewhere. Of course, the people of Puerto Rico are vitally interested in the solution of these problems. The insular legislature and the people at large have had neither the means nor the opportunity to remedy it.

The Congress of the United States, at the begining of the civil American regime in the island, passed an economic law to prevent the holding of great tracts of land. In connection with our organic act of 1900 the United States Congress passed a resolution prohibiting corporations from holding over 500 acres of land. That act was intended to remedy the then and actually existing situation, but, unfortunately, that act had no "teeth" in it. That is to say, it provided no means for prosecuting those who violate the purpose of that act.

At least that was the answer given by the various attorneys general of the island whenever such a case was brought to their attention, that the law had "false teeth", and a remedy should be found, to prevent large holding of land. The situation was brought about by the substantial change of conditions from the Spanish institutions to the American institutions. However, despite this handicap, the masses of the people have been constantly fighting toward better conditions, and they now do not fear to unite themselves for the purpose of asking for better conditions.

Apropos of the statements just made by the gentlemen who preceded me, to the effect that Puerto Rico would gain no practical advantage from statehood or even from the continuation of a permanent union with the United States, I wish to say to the gentlemen of this committee that the only possible way by which the welfare of the people of Puerto Rico can be guarded and improved, especially the welfare of the masses of the laborers, is to have absolute guaranty of freedom of association, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and freedom of strike. So far we have been struggling with what means for the working people we have had at our command and have today.

These guarantees should be continued and sustained in the island of Puerto Rico; and the only way, our only hope, is to pray for the continuation of the moral influences of, and association with, the people of the United States, their democratic freedom, and their institutions, that they may supervise those who for years have been opposed to the economic and social demands which have been made by the masses of workers year after year.

I also wish to state that the institutions of the United States are responsible for much of the wonderful progress made in Puerto Rico. When the American Army landed in Puerto Rico the working classes had no personality, no liberty, and no opportunity to extricate themselves from the miserable state in which they were at the time. The Spanish regime controlled the thoughts, the rights, and the moral integrity of the masses. The masses were poverty stricken, downtrodden; they were without recognition and utterly unable to defend and uplift themselves.

At that time there were only 23,000 children attending school, and of those 23,000 children most of them belonged to the privileged classes of Puerto Rico. The poor man, with a few exceptions, was unable to keep his children in school. And now we have over 250,000 children in schools and the schools admit the poor and humble as well as the rich and socially great. Then we had no university. Now a direct assessment is made which costs the people almost $1,000,000 each year. We now spend in the public schools $4,400,000 every year. We have a force of 4,600 teachers of both sexes teaching in our schools.

We had at that time a commerce with Spain that only represented 11,000,000 pesos, and today our commerce of importation and exportation sometimes has reached even $180,000,000 a year, and as an average, $120,000,000 every year.

We had no organization of labor at that time. I, myself, have been incarcerated many times for advancing the philosophy of organized labor. On one occasion, with others, I was sentenced to 4 years and 4 months in the penitentiary because I dared, as they said, to conspire to raise the price of labor, to form illicit societies. The societies were those that represented unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and the conspiracy was to raise the price of labor, representing an increase in the wages for the workers and diminishing the hours of labor. President Roosevelt and the American Federation of Labor were instrumental in freeing me and the workers by their intervention. The old laws of Spanish colonization were repealed and the principles of the Constitution of the United States began to prevail in the island.

We had at that time only 145 kilometers of roads. We have today over 2,000 kilometers of roads, and good roads, plenty of roads. Our government had at that time not one building suitable for a school, and today we have over 2,000 school buildings.

Most of those things, as good as they are, are not so important as the freedom obtained by the people, which is so necessary to keep our social education advancing, and the freedom for the formulation of every kind of program in every party, in every group, that the people enjoy under our Constitution and laws.

Elections have been going on better, better, and better, and that has been attained from the political and civic education, the influence and the benefits obtained by union of that people and that country to the United States. I guarantee that Puerto Rico is willing and wants to pay every obligation and duty and the cost of the reform of conditions over there, the economic and social conditions. We want to do our duty there, and our legislature has already considered this problem. If President Roosevelt finds difficulties in his way to accomplish the things that he has in mind to rehabilitate the island there, then the Legislature of Puerto Rico, with the cooperation of Congress and the President, will have to do it by itself within the Union. They, our legislators, well-to-do classes, and workers, have their duty to do their part in this recovery program. We have done that, and are beginning to do more and more. Consequently, if we have requested through this bill, H. R. 1394, that is under consideration at this hearing, our statehood and to think over this problem, it is because we understand that Puerto Rico, if it has to be a part of the United States, it is much better to be, with all of the obligations and all of the duties, an integral part and as a member of the Union.

We working classes think in that way, and I speak as such, because I have been working at my trade for years, and I consider myself a part of the organized workingmen of the island, and also it happens that I have been the founder of the Federation of Labor there in 1899, and I have been president since that time after the American occupation, though not before, because a labor federation was impossible to organize.

It happens also that when the workingman could not get recognition in the organizations of the political parties of Puerto Rico we had to organize the Labor Socialist Party, and we had to fight continually for the civil rights of the working masses, regardless of the opposition of the privileged people, and regardless of the reactionary actions of the corporations and government in favor of the political party that has for the last 30 years helped the development of those corporations.

It is very gratifying today to know that, owing to this tremendous social and economic influence and changes that came from the mainland, the ideals and the thoughts of those people who have had the responsibilities in the affairs of Puerto Rico over the masses of the people are changed, and they now are discussing ways and means to get better social and economic conditions and justice, and a better form of organized government within the union.

Mr. Chairman, I request that this matter of statehood be left open, to be given the most capable consideration and examination and discussion in the next session when the meetings of your committee can give more time to it and to the representatives of the people over there. It is true that you have before you Senator Barceló, who was the president of the senate, and is president of the Liberal Party, and also Senator Muñoz Marin. They have their own ideas and their own ideals. Of course, it has not been decided even by them whether or not definite steps will be taken or what will be best for the people of Puerto Rico, but I have stated these facts because I could not let this committee have the impression that the majority of the people of Puerto Rico think in any way but of being sincerely united with the people of the United States. The tremendous majority of the people of Puerto Rico are in favor of a permanent union with the United States. I have been elected on that program which I have carried out all over the island for many, many years.

What I am telling you now at this moment has been expressed continuously all over the island, the country of Puerto Rico, because I think, and I am convinced that it is the only way to have the masses of Puerto Rico, or of placing every class, especially the workers, where they may have a proper guaranty for their development, and they are anxious to get social and economic justice in the end.

Mr. PARSONS. What party were you elected under?

Commissioner IGLESIAS. The party I represent?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes.

Commissioner IGLESIAS. I am the Resident Commissioner elected by the coalition formed by the Union Republican and the Socialist Party. I am also president of the Labor Federation. Of course, the Socialist Party in Puerto Rico cannot yet be considered as Marxian, the membership has not yet obtained knowledge like the American Socialist Party. It has very little of the American socialist philosophy in its actions as the Socialist Party does not have that conception on the part of the majority of the people. As a practical matter for us the Socialist Party of Puerto Rico has been taken up and maintained as an expression of our ideals and principles, the bettering of conditions of the workers, and get justice to all.

The corporations over there have been organized because they have had not only the benefits of the tariff, but they have had also the protection and favors of the party that has been in power, to expand and become as strong and powerful as they are now.

Mr. PARSONS. What party was that?

Commissioner IGLESIAS. It was the Federal Party and the Unionist Party that was in power 29 years. Those things that these gentlemen have mentioned here today are not new to Puerto Rico. We had to come to this country in the past years just to ask for help and assistance against social and economic unjustices and oppressions.

I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, that these petitions and these declarations made here today by the opposition to statehood, have not in any way anything to do with the sentiments and the union of that people of Puerto Rico with the people of the United States. I believe all of them are good American citizens. We can and should remedy our corporation laws and I am very glad that many of the men of intelligence, position, and character have the opportunity to think today that those conditions and laws should be remedied.

It is wonderful the progress that, in all activities of life, has been made by the people of Puerto Rico, and especially in the minds of its leadership, notwithstanding those corporations and organizations that have been mentioned as being considered to be against the interests of the people. This is the result of the system and the same economic conditions that as such it demands the necessary changes to remedy the situation.

Mr. CROWE. In the elections you have had the united support of the sugar interests, have you?

Commissioner IGLESIAS. Never. We have never had the support of the sugar interests.

Mr. CROWE. I mean in the elections themselves.

Commissioner IGLESIAS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sorry, but the House is now meeting, gentlemen, and we must go. You can extend your remarks; and if you want to add something, you may do so.

Senator MUÑOZ MARIN. If you would permit me I would just like to say this further: I completely agree with Mr. IGLESIAS that political and civic conditions have been very greatly improved under the American regime. Our criticism is not directed to those factors but simply to the economic exploitation. That is all.

Commissioner IGLESIAS. We have been opposed, continually opposed, by the sugar interests from the standpoint of labor as represented by the Labor Federation and the Socialist Party. However, at present we are glad to know that they have begun to understand that the conditions of labor shall be improved.

Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, the committee adjourned.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report for printing in the RECORD under the rule:

PUBLIC UTILITY ACT OF 1935

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2796) to provide for the control and elimination of public-utility holding companies operating, or marketing securities, in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to regulate the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce, to amend the Federal Water Power Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2796, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with an extraordinary parliamentary situation in connection with this bill. It is a committee bill. Fifteen Democrats and one Republican on the committee voted for the bill. One Democrat voted "present." Six Republicans voted in the opposition.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], the chairman of the committee, of course presented the report. It recommends that the bill be adopted. But, to my amazement, I was unable to find anything in his splendid speech to indicate that he favored the bill in its present form. To the contrary, the intimation was strong that he would support certain provisions of the Senate bill over the corresponding provisions of the House bill.

When interrogated specifically on the subject, he stated that he was in favor of some provisions of this bill and of others of the Senate bill, but upon which and where and when he did not enlighten us. [Laughter.]

So that it would seem that the committee bill is without a friend, and since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] will not do so, it appears that nobody will speak for it. It is not my job, but down to me through the generations has come the rash disposition to champion causes when nobody else will defend them.

No man was ever so unworthy that he could not find in those of my blood a friend. If no one else would be his friend, then we would be his friend. It is a family trait. And so, unworthy as is this abandoned child of my friend from Texas, ugly as it may be, out of a spirit of chivalry I am impelled to come to its rescue and to take the hapless waif into my slender bosom. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I support this bill in toto. [Applause.] It is not my bill—no part of it is my bill. Not one short sentence is mine. Probably scarcely a word in it could be attributed to me. It is not the kind of a bill I should like to have. Its skeleton was so warped that it has been exceedingly difficult to build fair flesh upon it.

I speak only of title I, the holding-company part, as I know but little of the titles which deal with other subjects. At the conclusion of the hearings the bill was referred to a subcommittee of 4 Democrats and 2 Republicans, of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] was chairman. We labored long and faithfully on the bill. Weeks were spent reading every line, weighing as far as we could every syllable.

We found the bill as originally introduced utterly impossible. I advocated throwing it in the wastebasket, and that the committee undertake to write a reasonable, sensible bill that would regulate the holding companies and do what any reasonable man should want to do. [Applause.]

But we did not find that practical. What we had to do was to take this impossible bill, which in many respects, as I repeatedly said in the committee, approached the extreme rim of sanity, and try to make something out of it. We discussed it for many days. Of course, I presented my opinions and made my suggestions. In the course of the entire deliberations I made only possibly two motions. Practically everything that was written into the bill and every change made in it was made by the consent of the entire subcommittee, including the chairman. There were only a few exceptions where a vote was taken. I wanted to go along with the chairman. I wanted to accommodate myself to his views wherever it was reasonably possible to do so. I yielded to him in many instances. Upon no occasion did I take any unyielding position or refuse to go along. Such changes as were made in the bill were written under the chairman's direction and drafted by the Drafting Service.

When the bill was completed by the subcommittee we voted it out, and the chairman voted for it as changed. I voted for it. In many respects it did not suit me. There was scarcely a provision in the changed bill that I would have put in had it been left to me. We voted it out, and no reservations were made by the chairman or myself or by any other Democrat, except one, who reserved on a single section of the bill. Then we brought it to the full committee. We considered it there, and I sat by the chairman's side and I counseled him and tried to help to put the bill through exactly as the subcommittee had reported it, though, as I have said, in many respects it did not suit me. It was changed in full committee in only two particulars. Paragraph 1 (b) was stricken out. I did not think it was in proper form or substance, but I voted with the chairman and tried to keep it in. After it was stricken out I exerted myself to see that a new paragraph 1 (b) was written in, because I realized that without it the bill had no aspect of constitutionality and would not stand up in the courts for a moment. When we came to the final vote I voted with the chairman for the bill. Only a single Democrat present did not vote in the affirmative.

I had supposed that the chairman, Mr. RAYBURN, and I were in agreement, and I had hoped that he would defend the bill in the House in his speech upon it. He did not do so. I do not criticize him. No implication of criticism should be drawn from what I say. I say this merely by way of statement of fact, and as a comment upon the parliamentary situation that we are in.

Here is a bill, friendless, an orphan, and yet a bill that represents the will and decision of 15 Democrats upon the committee. It is a committee bill; it is entitled to the support of those who want to be "regular"—of those who want to follow the committee. Those who undertake to change it cannot be of the "regular" Democrats but of those who are "off the reservation."

I was not pleased with the bill, but I felt that we had succeeded in bringing it into such shape that a reasonable and fair man could afford to vote for it. I intend to vote for it. I am going through with it, although it does not well represent my views. Others may do as they choose, but as for me I do not feel that under the circumstances which I have related I am now free to throw the bill down and abandon it and leave it as an orphan and a waif.

What is the issue on this bill? In a few words, the issue is whether we will regulate or whether we will destroy. That is the issue. My position now is, and has been from the inception of this legislation, and may I say for long before it was introduced, that the utility-holding companies should be regulated. They should be rigidly and sharply regulated. The interests of the public, of the investors, and of the consumers should be protected by adequate regulation. That is what I have believed in all the time, what I believe in now, and what I advocate now.

I have some authority for that position. I read from the Democratic platform of 1932:

> We advocate regulation to the full extent of Federal power of holding companies which sell securities in interstate commerce.

Upon that plank I stand. [Applause.] Take note. It says "regulate." It does not say "destroy." Those who advocate destruction cannot quarrel with me for my Democracy. No Democrat can find fault with me for standing upon the Democratic platform of 1932. Socialists, radicals, and what not, of whatever stripe—they have the right to quarrel with me, but no Democrat dare challenge me on that. [Applause.]

The issue is, Shall we "regulate" or shall we "destroy"? That in turn resolves itself into this: Shall we correct the evils of the holding companies or shall we wreak vengeance upon them? Do you come to preserve, to build up, to correct, to improve that which is imperfect, or do you come in a punitive spirit to punish for the misdeeds of the past?

You would take vengeance, you say, by destroying the holding companies. Take vengeance upon whom? On the corporations who, as Mr. RAYBURN has said, are inanimate creatures and without souls? Would you take vengeance upon the corporation officials, who were guilty of the misdeeds and wrongs of which you complain? Some of these you would have to pursue into the Great Beyond, and I would suggest that you clothe yourselves with asbestos before you start on the quest. In very few instances do those individuals who took part in the wild speculation and the high finance of the period ending in 1929 remain in charge of the companies that they directed up to that time.

Who would you go after then? Do you want to "soak" their successors in office? Is that what you want to do? Let me say to you that you cannot strike them without striking the stockholders who stand back of them. What have the hapless investors done that you should take vengeance upon them? What have those who have put their savings of a lifetime into these securities done? What is their offense? What is their crime for which you are seeking to punish them?

Their only crime was that they were too trustful; they accepted too much or they believed, like millions of our people believed, that the orgy of 1926, 1927, and 1928 was a permanent and normal condition. The situation is no different in the utility field than in other fields. The spirit of speculation pervaded the land from end to end. The humblest wheelbarrow roller in our districts would have done the same thing that was done by those whom you now condemn had he only had the opportunity. What is the use of fooling ourselves?

The only crime of these investors is that they were too credulous. Their only crime is that already they have been punished and have lost most they had. For what they paid $100 for the average price is now somewhere between $20 and $30. Now, they look up and see their great Government, led by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], trying to take away from them the last few remaining pennies left of what they had invested. [Applause.]

Take vengeance upon them? All right, so be it. I care nothing for them, let us say, whether they be widows, orphans, bankers, or millionaires, or whatever they are. They have no right to stand in the way to thwart progress and the general welfare. So let us then dismiss them out of the picture and say we do not care what becomes of the utilities or what misfortunes befall the hapless investors. Then I ask whether, in your desire for vengeance, you are willing to reach over the heads of those who have invested in the companies and to strike the welfare of your country full in the face?

This measure is highly deflationary. It is even now having a bad effect upon business. It halts enterprise. It strikes at confidence. It retards recovery. In no sense of the word can this be called a recovery measure. There is nothing about it to put a single man or woman to work.

To the contrary, it discourages enterprise. It prevents development. It tends toward the time of a collapse in the electrical industry when many, many men now at work will find they have lost their jobs. It strikes a serious blow at heavy industry. It may retard recovery for an indefinite time.

That is the issue. It appears in many sections of this bill. Would that I had time to explain them more fully. The bill is a mystic maze. A man of average intelligence wandering into it will soon find himself hopelessly lost without knowing east from west or top from bottom. After weeks of study the most intelligent man will still remain in doubt as to what this bill means.

This bill was written by Mr. Benjamin Cohen and Mr. Thomas Corcoran, two bright young men brought down from New York to teach Congress "how to shoot." [Laughter and applause.] Some of us were here when both were yet in short pants. But these are days when experience and fidelity in public service or in business life are exceedingly "disqualifying." I pay them a tribute for the exceeding skill which they have shown in weaving in and weaving out, piling words upon words, phrase upon phrase, clause upon clause, until a Philadelphia lawyer would get down on his knees and pray to be delivered from the task of interpretation. [Laughter and applause.]

I hope I misunderstood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] yesterday in saying that he favored the bill in its original form. I defend him against that statement if he made it. Dozens of changes were made in the bill in the Senate. With perhaps one or two exceptions every one was a marked improvement. Then when it was characteristically "lobbed over" onto the House we took it up. We worked on it. We also made dozens of additional changes in the bill. Every change was an improvement upon the original. Every change was in the interest of clarification and good understanding. Every change was in the interest of fairness and justice and the reasonable regulation of the utilities. Every change strengthened the bill in its constitutional aspects.

Oh, I have quit talking about constitutional questions. I will not talk about any in connection with this bill. I promised the chairman I would hush about them. Many times I called attention to these problems in consideration of the bill and then, seeing it was a hopeless task, gave up all thought of constitutionality, and now I am going to vote for the bill, Constitution or no Constitution. [Laughter.]

I have some little reputation as a lawyer among those who know me. I practiced as a lawyer until I got tired of it; then I quit and walked around awhile, and then I got into this pickle that I am now in. [Laughter and applause.] I have a distinct hunch that there are some men in connection with this Government, and some who are perhaps now present in this Chamber, who are absolutely innocent on constitutional questions. [Laughter.] But I at least cannot plead the "baby act." I am 21 years old. I have to take my responsibility.

Of course, I do not know what was in the minds of those who wrote the bill. You cannot deduce it from the bill. You cannot find out there. I do not know what philosophy they were holding to. "What private griefs they had, alas, I know not, that made them do it." Suffice it to say that the bill was "fearfully and wonderfully made", and that every syllable was loaded with arsenic. The utilities charged, and it was charged again here yesterday, that the bill had an insincere purpose, that it was designed to produce chaos and ruin in the electrical industry so that out of the shipwreck might be salvaged Government and municipal ownership and other kindred spoil.

I decline to entertain any such idea. I refuse to believe that the bill has anything other than the purpose appearing from the face of it. Looked at from its face it would well warrant such a charge as has been made. It seemed to me to be designed to baffle, to harass, to ensnare, to enmesh, to confuse, to produce a situation beyond the wit of anybody to get through with. Our committee have cut some of these webs, we have destroyed some of the snares, we have made this bill into a bill that a reasonable, honest man can afford to vote for, a reasonable and fair-minded man who wants to regulate the utilities, who wants to do justice and who has a due regard for the rights of others and for the welfare of his country.

The bill gives to the Securities Commission powers exceeding any that should have been given; but I conceded them out of deference to my friend, Mr. RAYBURN. The bright spot in this connection is that practically all actions of the Commission are subject to review by the courts. The original bill did not do that. In some instances it threw those who were committed into their hands upon the mercies of the Commission. Given an honest and an intelligent commission, I do not fear the operation of this bill. If we should have a prejudiced and an unjust commission, then I should be fearful for the interests committed to their mercies. This is the situation which confronts us. We are compelled to assume that honest and intelligent men can be found to run the Government. Otherwise we are lost.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, much has been said about section 11. Attention has been unduly concentrated upon that section. Let me say that in my opinion it is much less important than has been represented. There are other sections of this bill that are of fairly equal importance.

Section 11 of the bill, as passed by the Senate, provided that a holding company should not continue to control more than a single "geographically and economically integrated public-utility system." Who could have lived under those terms? The Consolidated Gas Co. of New York, a $2,000,000,000 concern. Thus, it was not the size of the company nor the amount of capital invested that was being aimed at; there was no purpose in that section to scatter aggregation of capital, because the Consolidated Gas Co., which is an integrated system, would be preserved.

It was not geographical size that was aimed at, for the American Gas Co. would have been preserved under that section. The American Gas Co. is a holding company of a single integrated system which stretches from North Carolina to Michigan, and includes the States of Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, and parts of several adjoining States—a sprawling empire, to use the pet phrase. Yet that company would have been preserved by section 11. So it was not that kind of situation that was aimed at. If the American Gas Co. had owned a plant in Charleston, W. Va., and another in Columbus, Ohio, just two plants, and they were not connected in any way, then the American Gas Co. would have been put out of business. That is the sense of section 11; that is the sense of the Senate amendment. That is what you are going to be asked to vote for in the effort to substitute section 11 of the Senate bill for the House section.

You are sensible men; I do not need to argue with you about a situation like that. What difference does it make whether the American Gas Co. owns the territory solidly from Newport News to Detroit or whether it owns a few plants between those points? What harm will be done in the one case more than in the other?

What does section 11 of the committee bill do? It provides that if the Commission shall find that the situation of any holding company owning more than one integrated system is detrimental to the public interests the Commission may require the holding company to divest itself of all except a single system. That is the difference between the two sections. The public interest is made the test in the House provision. The public interest is made the guide by which the Commission will know how to proceed. The Senate bill would go after this situation with a meat ax and would destroy good, bad, and all, except those particular companies which happen to be in the peculiar situation to fit in with the arbitrary and capricious provision which was adopted. That is the issue on this provision of the bill. Alice in Wonderland has come to Washington.

"Let the jury consider their verdict," the King said. "No," said the Queen, "sentence first, verdict afterward."

I join with the chairman in deploring the pressure from the outside which has come upon Congress in connection with this legislation. It has tended to disturb and to thwart sound judgment and careful reasoning. It has tended to prevent fair and just decisions in the public interest. It has been generally hurtful. Where and when did this propaganda start? Not yesterday, not with the introduction of this bill, but years ago. It would be hard for me, though a student of this matter as I have been—it would be hard for me to tell which side began it first, because it has been on both sides of the issue. It was first brought to my attention by utility advertisements in the papers 15 years or more ago, and later it was found that the companies had injected into schoolbooks and other school literature statements on the subject which were more or less misleading. That continued to grow, and the condemnation continued until in 1928 the Senate adopted a resolution directing an investigation of utility-company practices by the Federal Trade Commission.

The Commission set some capable gentlemen to work. They began to dig into the utility-company records and papers. They followed the same method as followed by the gentleman from Texas on yesterday. They would dig in, and when they found anything wrong they would rise up and trumpet it to the world. I am reliably informed that the Federal Trade Commission issued during its investigation somewhere near 300 newspaper releases in the form of publicity stuff, telling the people of the country what they had found wrong with the utilities. They spent more than $2,000,000 in getting material to put out, and so forth. They succeeded in building up a strong public sentiment against the utilities. It was like writing the story of a man's life in which you tell every unworthy deed he ever did and every unworthy thought that ever entered his mind and ignoring altogether all the good things that might have been said in his behalf. And which among you gentlemen could stand up with that kind of a biography? [Laughter and applause.]

So they whipped the country into a rage; they formed a public opinion, especially among those who had the least information and hence are most suspicious; they raised this public opinion to a fever heat. Demagogues grasped their opportunity and agitators saw that the time was ripe for them. So, like vultures riding the storm, they mounted upon this wave of ill will and opinion against the utilities. They have continued to ride right down to this time.

This is the finest demagogue bait ever spread. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Alabama 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, as I said, this is the finest demagogue bait that was ever spread; they not only get a chance to "soak the rich" and to fan the prejudices of the poor against those who happen to have managed to hold on to a stray nickel but they are able to draw around their shoulders the cloak of patriotism—"I am the defender of the people." [Applause.]

I deplore these outside influences. There is the Tennessee Valley Authority, with its program of propaganda slipped into school literature and put out to the people through their publicity agencies. They have a staff set up in my own city with the sole mission of molding public opinion through addressing women's clubs and labor organizations and this, that, and the other organization. [Applause.] At the expense of the taxpayers of the United States they are converting the people to the idea of more power and more influence to the Tennessee Valley Authority; that they should be clothed with the authority not only to save men's bodies but to take care of their souls.

For that matter, public officials here in Washington are not guiltless. They have done their part. I criticize nobody. Please do not think that I have any such thought in mind. [Laughter.] But before we had had the first hearing on this bill the chairman of our committee mounted the radio and "radioed" from one end of the country to the other, telling the people how bad the utilities are and how much this kind of legislation was needed. I say to him that his influence and his word went farther than 10,000,000 letters received from humble constituents who do not know very much about what is going on here. He was not alone in riding this wave. Others have been riding it since. Even the Chief Executive has repeatedly thrown his all-powerful influence into the scale.

Let us have done with this talk of propaganda. Both sides are guilty. Both have interfered with a fair and just decision upon the part of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I picked up a newspaper this morning published in my own home town, a low type of newspaper [laughter], a chain newspaper, owned by a newspaper-holding company, the most vicious form that a holding company can take. I find here on the front page, under a large heading, they have printed a column written by a pair of Washington back-stairs gossipers, who sneak through governmental alleys and collect for peddling to the provincial press juicy morsels out of the garbage cans of politics. [Laughter and applause.]

Here is what it says. Here is the headline furnished, not by these purveyors of political carrion but by the Post, this low-grade chain newspaper:

DR. HUDDLESTON is charged with pulling the teeth from utility measure.

Then it proceeds to say of four gentlemen of the subcommittee—I will not call their names out of respect for them—

This quartet was chiefly responsible for hamstringing the legislation closest to the President's heart, the holding corporation bill. Members of the roughriding squad are GEORGE HUDDLESTON, Alabama Democrat, who, despite loud protestations of devotion to the cause of liberalism, has waged bitter war, usually behind the scenes, on some of the President's key reforms.

First, may I say that I have never made the slightest pretense to liberalism, or any other kind of "ism", except democracy of the old-fashioned southern type. [Applause.] I have never posed as a liberal, but I have tried to be a Thomas Jefferson Democrat, and of that I am not ashamed. [Applause.] And if in following that star my path should lead away from some of the courses which are now being pursued, then I am content to take the responsibility.

Second, may I ask, since when has liberalism been the synonym for irresponsible experimentation and the reckless disregard of liberty and property rights? Such a false liberalism is a stench in my nostrils.

Mr. Chairman, this publication is a lie, a vicious lie. The four gentlemen named have not tried to hamstring any bill. We have done our best to convert this measure into a reasonable, fair bill. We believe that it is now a reasonable and fair bill and one such as declared for by the Democratic platform, and will regulate but will not destroy. I, for one, am going to "stand hitched." Others may quit whenever they get ready.

I should like to go along with the chairman of the committee. It pains me deeply not to do so for I am greatly attached to him. But before my affection for the chairman must come my duty to my country [applause], and whether it be propaganda from one source or another, whether it be influence brought to bear by officials of the utilities or by their stockholders, or whether, on the other hand, it be the threats of the demagogues and the agitators, or whether it be to oppose the will of the Chief Executive of the Nation, I will do what I think is right. [Applause.]

I will do what I think is right. I will support "regulation" and not "destruction"—correction and not vengeance. I will do justice without fear or favor, and neither the imps of darkness nor those who have seen a new light shall move me the breadth of a hair. Upon this rock I take my stand. "And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, in listening to the debate here yesterday afternoon I, too, commenced to wonder if the substitute bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had become an orphan with "none so poor to do him reverence", and during the afternoon I felt inclined, if necessary in order to give the orphan a home or a place of shelter to go to, to offer to adopt it, but I am glad to know after the speech of the gentleman from Alabama that that is not necessary.

My position on this legislation can be stated in a few words. I find myself in disagreement with the extremes on both sides of it. I do not agree with those who believe in the death sentence; nor do I agree with those who are sled-length opposed to the substitute bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or to the passage of any legislation on the subject.

That abuses have existed in the public-utility holding company field every one, who knows anything about the business, knows. There may be, and are, differences of opinion as to the number and extent of these abuses, but that there have been abuses everyone concedes. Personally, I feel that the abuses have been more general than they should have been and that legislation should be passed to correct existing evils and to prevent, as far as possible, their recurrence in the future.

Further than that, I believe that the very nature and extent of the business justifies Federal legislation to supervise and control its operations. I do not believe, however, that it is necessary to burn down the barn in order to get rid of the rats in it.

I do not know that anyone needs to shed any tears as far as the holding companies themselves as such are concerned, although they are having troubles enough of their own with impractical theorists running around the country with roving commissions and unlimited public funds at their disposal, constructing dams and setting up power plants almost anywhere that they see fit and at costs limited only by the resources of the Government, to compete with them. However, there are some 5,000,000 common everyday American citizens who have put their savings and other moneys into the securities of utility companies, believing that they were making proper and legitimate investments, who will have to bear the brunt of any adverse legislation affecting the industry, and millions of others who will be affected by it, directly or indirectly.

I believe that a proper regulatory bill should and can be passed that will remedy the abuses without doing unnecessary harm to this countless number of innocent people. I believe that the House substitute bill will do the trick. It is not perfect, but, considering the approach, as the gentleman from Alabama has so vividly described it, it, perhaps, is as good as could be expected. As compared with the bill as originally introduced, or as passed by the Senate, it is as different as day is from night. It is the difference between life and death. The House substitute bill differs in many particulars from the Senate bill; in fact, the House committee has practically rewritten all the important provisions of the bill, but the chief controversy arises over section 11, or the so-called "death sentence" section of the Senate bill.

Waiving minor exceptions and fine-spun distinctions and contentions, for all practical purposes it may be said that the Senate bill requires the dissolution of all public-utility holding companies, as such, or as they are now known, at the end of 5 years unless the continued existence of any given company is necessary for the operation of a geographically and economically integrated public-utility system, whatever that may mean, serving an economic region in a single State, or extending into two or more contiguous States.

The House bill does not attempt to destroy or interfere with existing set-ups or with the properties now owned by holding companies, or with future acquisitions, whether they are the securities or properties of utility companies or otherwise, unless the Securities and Exchange Commission finds that it is necessary in the public interest so to do, and, in reaching its conclusions, the Commission must follow certain standards as set forth in the bill.

A great many of the abuses heretofore indulged in, so far as the issuance and sale of securities by public-utility holding companies are concerned, have already been corrected and their repetition made impossible by the passage of the Securities and the Stock Exchange Acts in the last Congress.

I can see no reason why holding companies should be dissolved or executed or required to give up property which they have lawfully acquired, unless it is necessary in the public interest that they should do so.

Under the House bill, as reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, if the Securities and Exchange Commission finds that it is necessary, in the public interest, it may limit their operations or holdings as it sees fit, acting according to the standards there laid down.

What more in reason can anyone contend is either necessary or desirable? The death sentence is questionable from the standpoint of constitutionality, and from the standpoint of those who have put their money into the securities of holding companies it is unconscionable and inhuman. It takes property without due process of law. It will further demoralize business and the investing public and retard recovery. It is unnecessary and wrong, and the Congress of the United States has no right to pass it, even if it may have the constitutional power to do so. I am opposed to it. I favor the substitute bill as reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and I expect to vote for it on its final passage unless it is spoiled by amendments during the consideration of it here in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I propose in what I may have to say to show to the House by quotations from the original House bill as presented here and the bill which is now presented as a Senate amendment how the consideration of the question has affected the minds of our committee. The fundamental difficulty with the original bill which was offered was that it was introduced as a punitive measure and not as a regulatory measure.

It began with a long statement of abuses, which I need not read, but I will read the conclusion which was stated in the bill as a result of the consideration of those abuses.

It is the paragraph (13) to section 1:

(13) the abuses above enumerated are so commonly associated with the activities of public-utility holding companies that have been so persistent and so wide-spread that they necessitate legislation to control and eliminate the holding company as an artificial corporate device inherently injurious to investors, consumers, and the general public.

Then follows the policy of the bill, which concludes with a statement providing "at the end of 5 years for the abolition of the public-utility holding company." The original bill made no distinction as to holding companies—any holding company was a menace and would be eliminated in 5 years.

When the committee began to take evidence it was soon shown that while some few utility companies had committed grave offenses, the majority of holding companies had not. It was also shown that a holding utility company was an essential, because in some States in order to have the right of eminent domain for the condemnation of property it was necessary that the corporation should have a charter in that State.

It was further found that the utility company in this particular field had been of inestimable benefit to the country at large.

That was shown from a good source, David Lilienthal, manager of the Tennessee Valley Association, before he got into the Government service, in an article published in the Columbia Law Review in 1929. He said that the public-utility company had served a good purpose in sparsely settled districts, and he wound up with this:

Perhaps the most important of all to the holding company must go the credit for the unprecedented flow of capital into the public-utility industry, making possible extensions and improvements of service. Every phase of public-utility operation—financing, accounting, engineering, management, public relations—has undergone great changes under the new regime.

As a result of that the committee came to the conclusion that the statement that holding companies was an evil was an error.

In examining the House bill I think we are forced to the conclusion that those who had drawn it intended two things.

Their intention was, first, to centralize all the authority over holding companies, in every particular, in the Federal Government. Inasmuch as it was shown by statistics that only 15 percent of the entire electrical power produced in the United States was used in interstate commerce and 85 percent used intrastate, it seemed to many of the committee that that provision was going rather far. To illustrate the original intention of the bill I am going to ask the patience of the Committee while I read the sections in the original bill. Section 201 (a) of title II in the original bill reads as follows:

SEC. 201. (a) The provisions of this title shall apply to the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce and to the production of energy for such transmission and sale, except where such electric energy is sold for use within the State in which it is generated. The Commission shall have jurisdiction over all facilities for such transmission, sale, and/or production of energy by any means and over all facilities connected therewith as parts of a system of power transmission situated in more than one State, except facilities for the retail distribution of electric energy, or for the production or transmission of energy solely for the use of the producer or transmitter or the use of his tenants on property owned or controlled by him and not for resale. Every person who owns or operates facilities subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission under this title and every person who controls, directly or indirectly, any such person, shall be subject to the provisions of this act. The term "public utility" when used in this act means any person who owns or operates such facilities.

You can see there that if by reason of interstate commerce the Commission got control of any electrical producer, they had control of the whole business, including the plant and all employees. If you think I exaggerate, let me read a further section of the original bill, which goes more into detail:

SEC. 209. Whenever the Commission, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon complaint, shall find that the rules, regulations, practices, facilities, or service of any public utility, or the method of production, transmission, or supply employed by it, are unjust, unreasonable, unsafe, improper, inadequate, or insufficient, the Commission shall determine the just, reasonable, safe, proper, adequate, or sufficient rules, regulations, practices, equipment, appliances, facilities, service, or methods to be observed, furnished, constructed, enforced, or employed, and shall fix the same by its order, rule, or regulation.

That covers the ground so that if the United States Commission got in at all they had absolute control of the production of electricity, and its distribution from the plant, and also of the power plant and its management. To show what was the effect of the study of our committee on that section I shall read the section which took the place of the original section 201 (a), and it will be seen there is quite a difference. Let me say, to start with, that what we had in view was to protect the rights of the State and the State commissions in the first place, and to protect the public utilities against being compelled by outside influences to build new plants. I read section 201 as now written in the substitute:

SEC. 201. (a) It is hereby declared that the business of transmitting and selling electric energy for ultimate distribution to the public is affected with a public interest and that Federal regulation of that part of such business which consists of the transmission of electric energy in interstate commerce and the sale of such energy at wholesale in interstate commerce is necessary in the public interest, such Federal regulation, however, to extend only to those matters which are not subject to regulation by the States.

Section 209, which I read, and which gave the Federal Commission power over every conceivable activity and also gave it power to act on its own initiative, is now changed to section 207, and reads as follows:

SEC. 207. Whenever the Commission, upon complaint of a State commission, after notice to each State commission and public utility affected and after opportunity for hearing, shall find that any interstate service of any public utility is inadequate or insufficient, the Commission shall determine the proper, adequate, or sufficient service to be furnished, and shall fix the same by its order, rule, or regulation: Provided, That the Commission shall have no authority to compel the enlargement of generating facilities for such purposes nor to compel the public utility to sell or exchange energy when to do so would impair its ability to render adequate service to its customers.

Those are the important changes in the regulatory features. As to the "death-penalty" clause, that, of course, has been very much improved. That has been commented upon by former speakers, and I shall not enlarge upon it. I regret to say, however, that in my opinion the penalty clause now is so broad as to be injurious to the public interest. It does give the Commission great latitude, and it does not enact an absolute automatic death penalty; but, on the other hand, it does not give legal sanction to any of the utilities. They are still within the power of this Commission. Mr. Chairman, one great difficulty with recent legislation by this Congress has been to center and confer too large power upon the Federal Government in Washington in itself and in the commissions appointed by it; and this bill contains that same fault. It leaves all these public utilities for 5 years up in the air. It will make them all so anxious to know where they stand that they will fear to extend their plants and service. A good many impartial experts think that if the regulatory features in this bill were enacted this regulation in connection with the securities bill and stock-exchange bill is all the protection the public would need. I now say to the committee that, in my opinion, at least no harm would come, as we have made a good start on the regulatory side of the bill, if this legislation should be allowed to wait until the next session of Congress, and give the Congress and the public a chance to study what is really needed and whether this bill fills that need. I agree that there is some unnecessary alarm in the public now, but much of it is justified. I think further time for study and consideration would be in the public interest.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is his opinion that section 11 of the House bill authorizes the Commission to do, in its discretion, what section 11 of the Senate bill requires the Commission to do in the matter of abolishing the holding company?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. I should say substantially, yes. I think the burden of proof perhaps is changed. They cannot abolish unless they think there are certain abuses, but if they do, I think they have just as much power as they had before.

Mr. MOTT. And if the Commission were composed of people whose policy is the same as that expressed in section 11 of the Senate bill and whose policy is that expressed by the President on this subject, then they would no doubt have that discretion to put holding companies all out of business if they wanted to.

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. I think that is true.

Mr. MOTT. That is, under section 11 of the House bill.

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. It is near enough true so that everybody will be very anxious about it and would not be willing to go ahead and do business.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would the findings of the Commission under those circumstances be the subject of review by the courts?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. I hesitate to express a decided opinion, but I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER].

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Chairman, I could wish for a better attendance of the jury, but that is one of the fortunes of debate.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twelve Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall follow the example set by my distinguished colleagues yesterday, and in order to conserve my time, will request that I be allowed to proceed without interruption. If any time should remain after I have finished, I shall be very glad to yield for questions.

Also, in order that I may not scatter my shot, I shall confine myself rather closely to my manuscript.

Since the middle of February the major portion of my time has been devoted to a study of the problem of utility holding company regulation. For almost 2 months and a half open hearings were conducted before the full Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and for over 6 weeks the subcommittee, of which it was my privilege to be a member, met daily in executive session to consider title I of the bill, which had been introduced by Chairman RAYBURN.

May I preface my remarks with a brief digression in appraisal of the public service that is being rendered by our chairman and my associates on the committee? The painstaking and conscientious care with which my associates have carried on their duties is not excelled, I am sure, by any judicial tribunal in the land. Many and serious divergencies of views developed during the consideration of this bill, some of them irreconcilable because involving conflicts of fundamental political thought and philosophy. Our discussions were always on a high plane, never acrimonious, and at all times intellectually inspiring even if not harmonious. Through the trying days and weeks our chairman guided our deliberations with gentle yet steady hand, with never a denial of the fullest opportunity to each member for the most exhaustive presentation of his views. Upon me, as one of the newer members of the committee, Chairman RAYBURN'S unfailing courtesy, his sympathetic forbearance, and his stout defense of what he believes to be right, in the face of powerful opposition, has left a lasting impression. Truly may be applied to him also the words that are inscribed on the memorial to James Buchanan over in Meridian Park:

The incorruptible statesman whose walk is upon the mountain ranges of the law.

Very early in our investigation it became apparent to me that the bill which had been introduced by Chairman RAYBURN sought to meet what is a crying national need. A reading of the findings of the Federal Trade Commission pursuant to the Senate resolution of 1928, and of the report of Dr. Splawn, prepared under the authority of the House, both the result of years of thorough investigation, placed that question beyond the realm of reasonable doubt. Further valuable information on the subject has been supplied by the reports of the Federal Power Commission and of the National Power Policy Committee. And the showing made before our committee by holding-company representatives did not refute but confirmed that conclusion.

The field of study thereupon resolved itself into two parts:

First. The extent of congressional power; and Second. Methods of effective regulation.

To be still more specific, the lines of battle in this conflict between giants have gradually formed about the questions, first, of the Government's power to regulate at all, and, second, of the Government's power to make that regulation effective by compelling the necessary simplification of the capital structure of the utility industry through reorganization and elimination therefrom of the holding-company device, which is undoubtedly the one element that is directly responsible for all the evils and abuses that it is sought to correct and to prevent. That we are in fact engaged in a battle between giants there can be no doubt. On the one front are arrayed the forces of the Federal Government, without any profit motive and solely in the public interest, seeking to supplement and strengthen efforts of the States to protect the people against exploitation in a public service that is inherently monopolistic and essentially affected with a public interest. On the other front stand the forces of concentrated economic and political power, which, while the people slept, invaded practically every business avenue, and now reach with their tentacles of interrelated and interlocking control into every fiscal activity in the Nation. No reasonable mind that has given sustained thought to the extent and the significance of these developments can deny the serious import of the President's conclusion that there has been built up in the public-utility field a system of private socialism which is inimical to the welfare of a free people. The opportunity for private profit has become so intriguing, the continued exercise of centralized economic power is so appealing that no surprise need be felt, human ambitions being what they are, over the stout resistance the Government is encountering in its endeavor to dislodge the privileged few from the citadel of citadels out of which they manipulate their effective controls, to wit, the holding-company device.

In its very nature and as its name clearly implies, the holding company is an artificial thing, the owner of no physical property in its own right, the contributor of nothing to the support of the Federal and State governments under whose laws it now so vociferously claims the right of equal protection. Under the common law it has no right to exist—it is an outlaw. Under the code of laws that the Congress has enacted for the District of Columbia it likewise has no right to exist; it is an outlaw. Under the laws of various States, by reason of their desire for license fees, its corporate creation has been permitted. It may be remarked in passing that the bill as introduced by Chairman RAYBURN accords, as a matter of national policy, no more drastic treatment to the holding-company device than has long been the declared policy of the Congress toward that device within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia. So even if it be a "death sentence" that the Rayburn bill and the Senate bill propose, as holding-company opponents of the legislation are continuously pleased to call it with such dramatic emphasis, then it must be conceded that Congress in its wisdom deemed the public welfare of the District to demand the continuance of such provision in its Criminal Code.

But I must not consume any more of my limited time in a discussion of the need for or the mechanics of effective regulation, for my main purpose in the course of this general debate is to give the Membership of the House the benefit of my research and my conclusions, for whatever they may be considered to be worth, as to the constitutional power of Congress to deal effectively with this entire subject that is of such vital national concern. In this research a member of the staff of the Attorney General of the United States has given me valuable assistance of which I make grateful acknowledgment.

My views and conclusions that effective Federal regulation of the utility industry cannot begin until there has first been exercised a compulsory simplification of the complex and intricate holding-company structure, together with a full review of the reasons requiring the substitution of sections 11 and 13 of the Senate bill, are set forth at length in the report accompanying the committee bill that is before us for consideration, and I can only hope that my colleagues may take the time to read them with care.

Before commencing my own formal discussion of the question of constitutional limitations, it may be appropriate for me to make some observations for the benefit of my good friend and fellow subcommittee member, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL], whose intellectual attainments and sincerely patriotic impulses command my genuine admiration and highest respect. In the RECORD of June 20 he has contributed an analysis of the legislation and a learned discussion of the law that he considers applicable thereto. He announces the unvarnished conclusion that the Senate bill, and—to follow his logic—our House committee bill also, are beyond the power of Congress, and he attacks even the wisdom of the bill's effort to regulate the utility industry, on the broad ground that it would hamper business recovery.

His latter position depends for its verity upon the kind of recovery that the Nation needs. If we want another wild orgy of stock-market skyrocketing, uncontrolled speculation, market rigging, pool manipulation, watered capitalization, unconscionable write-ups, preferred lists of favored investors, bank presidents on holding-company pay rolls, call-money loans by holding companies to create speculation and exaggerated prices for their own securities—if we want these things, yes. But I cannot agree that a reduction and simplification of the capitalized size of the holding-company systems and the elimination of the intervening layers of nonproductive, excrescent, and exorbitant salaried pay rollers, and unearned, uneconomic, profit collectors can be of anything else but benefit to the investors in the system's securities and the customers of the operating companies at the bottom of the structure whose earnings, after all, must supply the vast sprawling creature's entire sustenance. And certainly that which is of benefit to the legitimate investor and the bill-paying consumer will redound to the greatest good of the general public. No; the recovery that the Nation needs is the kind the President had in mind when he said in his radio address of April 28: "I consider this legislation a positive recovery measure."

The gentleman from Indiana approaches the legal questions by assuming the premise that Congress cannot, merely because one is engaged in interstate commerce, regulate those of his activities that are entirely unrelated to any interstate-commerce activity. That is undoubtedly good law, but it does not hit the holding-company facts, as I believe the later discussion in the more technical portion of my brief will amply demonstrate. He also assumes that the ownership of stock in a corporation chartered in another State does not make the owner one who is engaged in interstate commerce. That also is good law, but it does not hit the holding company facts because to be a holding company there must be ownership of sufficient stock to constitute control, and the very exercise of that control and resulting supervision constitutes interstate commerce in itself. He also reaches the mistaken conclusion that the death sentence may be imposed even upon operating companies as such. He overlooks the fact in his analysis of section 11 that there may be subsidiary companies which are also unregistered holding companies and that unless the law is to fail in its requirement that the operations of the holding company system shall be limited to a single integrated public-utility system, it must be made to apply to a subsidiary to the extent and in the capacity that it may be itself a holding company.

I shall now endeavor to review as succinctly and understandably as I may, the controversial phases of the legislation that is before us in the light of the commerce clause and the due-process clause of the Constitution.

THE COMMERCE CLAUSE

The only companies regulated by the bill are those engaged in interstate commerce. This appears from an analysis of several sections of the statute. Section 11 applies only to registered holding companies. Section 5 allows any holding company to register, and section 4 provides that unless a holding company is registered under section 5 it shall be unlawful for it to transmit through the mail or by any instrumentality of interstate commerce utility assets, sales or service contracts, or securities, or to engage in any business in interstate commerce. Thus, if a company does not engage in any interstate commerce or use the instrumentalities of interstate commerce it need not register and would not come within section 11. Moreover, the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is to administer this portion of the act, is required by section 3 (a) to exempt any holding company from the provisions of title I of the act, if it deems the exemption not detrimental to the public interest when such holding company is "predominantly intrastate in character" and carrying on its business and the business of its subsidiary companies substantially in a single State. The exemptions granted to such companies would, of course, free them from the provisions of section 11. It is clear, therefore, that intrastate transactions are in no wise sought to be affected unless they should be so intertwined with interstate transactions that "the government of the one involves the control of the other", in which event it is for Congress to prescribe the dominant rule under Houston, etc., Co. v. United States (234 U. S. 342).

It may be well first to dispose of the question as to whether or not holding companies, either directly or through their controlled subsidiaries, engage in interstate commerce, before proceeding to analyze the relationship between section 11 and interstate commerce. First, about 20 percent of the electricity consumed in the United States is transmitted across States lines, and these transmission systems are controlled by the utility holding companies. This interstate transmission is obviously interstate commerce in its narrowest sense (Public Utilities Commission v. Attleboro Steam & Electric Co., 273 U. S. 83); second, the holding companies themselves generally engage in the making of contracts for services, sales of commodities, construction, and supervision with the operating companies. Since the holding companies control operating companies in many States, the making and performing of these contracts are often interstate transactions. The supervision exercised by the holding companies over the operating companies is dependent upon the transmission of information and material over State lines for their very existence. To the extent that the holding companies are engaged in making such interstate contracts and in interstate communication and the transmission of information and commodities across State lines, they are without question engaged in interstate commerce; third, the holding companies are also engaged in the interstate distribution of securities. It is to be remembered that the evils of the holding company system are largely attributable to their financial structure. The securities of the various companies are sold throughout the Nation. The interstate distribution of securities would seem to be interstate commerce, even more clearly than the distribution of lottery tickets (Champion v. Ames, 188 U. S. 321) or the distribution of correspondence courses (International Textbook Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91), regulation of both of which has been upheld by the Supreme Court. Cases such as Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall. 168) and New York Life Insurance Co. v. Deer Lodge Co. (231 U. S. 495), which hold that insurance contracts are not the subject of commerce, do not seem applicable to securities which are bought and sold as objects of commerce in the same way as tangible commodities. The pending bill merely follows the Securities Act and the Stock Exchange Act in assuming that the interstate transmission of securities is interstate commerce.

It is certainly immaterial that in many instances subsidiary corporations rather than holding companies themselves carry on interstate commerce, for the power of Congress to regulate all corporations engaged in or controlling interstate movement cannot be diminished by the establishment of separate but completely dominated subsidiary corporate entities. There can remain no doubt, therefore, that in all their activities out of which abuses arise the facilities of interstate commerce are made use of.

Let us now examine the facts and the law that support section 11:

A. The Federal Government has the power to regulate businesses engaged in interstate commerce. It is familiar law that the States have the right to impose certain reasonable conditions even to the extent of prohibition upon the rights of foreign corporations to engage in intrastate commerce within their borders; by the same process of reasoning Congress has the power to impose conditions upon the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. The pending bill is limited in this respect in the same manner as is the Interstate Commerce Act regulating railroads. The latter act regulates in great detail common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. The regulation covers much more than the interstate movement of goods by the railroads and includes regulation of many activities which are not interstate commerce themselves, but which are closely related to the interstate activities of the roads. In section 5, paragraph 2, of the Interstate Commerce Act, for example, acquisition by one carrier of control of another carrier is made subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This provision has been upheld by the Supreme Court (New York Central Securities Corporation v. United States, 287 U. S. 12). The pending bill does not raise the problem as to whether Congress can go so far as to attach to the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce any conditions which are reasonable, from the standpoint of the general public well-being, even though not directly related to interstate commerce. It is only necessary in support of this legislation to assume that Congress can impose conditions upon the right to use interstate commerce which do bear a reasonable relationship to the control of the interstate commerce in question. Section 11 regulates the form of organization of companies engaged in interstate commerce. The "form" in this case is really the dominant characteristic of the entire utility industry. It is the reason for being of the holding company and is the cause of the evil practices which the holding company has made possible. The capacity of one company to hold stock in many other companies is in large part responsible for the existing need for regulating interstate distribution of electricity and of utility securities. Thus a change in the form of organization of the utility companies engaged in interstate commerce is definitely and closely related to the method of carrying on the interstate commerce.

Prior statutes afford amply supporting analogies for this type of regulation of companies engaged in interstate commerce. The purpose of the Sherman Act was to break up similar methods of monopolistic control over interstate trade. In Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S. 1), the Supreme Court ordered the dissolution of the parent holding company and the distribution of the stocks held by it among the stockholders of the subsidiary corporations. Similarly, in the commodities clause of the Hepburn Act, section 1, paragraph 8, of the Interstate Commerce Act, Congress has forbidden railroads to transport in interstate commerce commodities produced by them or under their authority; under this section railroads have been required to divorce subsidiary coal companies controlled and managed as a part of their organization (United States v. Reading Co., 253 U. S. 26; United States v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., 220 U. S. 257).

The Child Labor case (Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251), does not stand in the way of this type of regulation; the Child Labor Act was there held invalid because it was deemed an effort to regulate the business of intrastate manufacturers not directly connected with interstate commerce. The compulsory dissolution of holding companies engaged in interstate commerce, because of the effect of the holding-company structure upon that commerce, is an entirely different thing.

B. No one any longer denies that the holding company device has caused serious injury, both to investors in utility securities and to consumers of electricity. The prices of both the securities and the electricity have been manipulated by means of the holding company, fraudulent and unconscionable contracts are carried out by means of interstate facilities, and the public has been deceived and gouged. If these activities were carried on within a single State they could be regulated by the State government. Obviously they could not injure citizens in other States except through the use of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce—through transmitting property or information across State lines. The States of origin or destination cannot under the commerce clause regulate this use of interstate instrumentalities. If the interstate commerce productive of such harmful results in the States of destination is to be regulated at all, the regulation must be by the Federal Government; otherwise there would be a gap in our constitutional system, clearly unintended by the fathers, which would prevent such commerce from being regulated by any agency. Power over such interstate commerce, previously belonging to the States, would have been destroyed by the Constitution rather than given to the Federal Government. Even the dissenting minority of the Supreme Court in the Northern Securities case admitted that this was not the case, saying:

> The Constitution, whilst distributing the pre-existing authority, preserved it all. (Cf. Story, 2 Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 1084.)

The Supreme Court has indicated that Congress can regulate interstate commerce in order to prevent harmful results in the State of destination. In Brooks v. United States (267 U. S. 432, 436) Chief Justice Taft declared:

> Congress can certainly regulate interstate commerce to the extent of forbidding and punishing the use of such commerce as an agency to promote immorality, dishonesty, or the spread of any evil or harm to the people of other States from the State of origin. In doing this it is merely exercising the police power within the field of interstate commerce.

It is true that in the Brooks case the Court was dealing with the Motor Vehicle Theft Act, which forbade the interstate transportation of stolen automobiles, and not with a statute which regulated the intrastate acts of persons engaged in interstate commerce. But if it is a proper congressional purpose to prohibit the use of interstate commerce for harmful results, and if the harm is caused by the form of organization of the entity engaged in interstate commerce, it surely follows that Congress must likewise have the power to prevent the use of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce by companies adopting such an organization.

In view of the subsequent Brooks decision, Hammer against Dagenhart cannot be said to prevent regulation of interstate commerce in commodities which are not intrinsically harmful themselves when the interstate movement is productive of evil results. Stolen automobiles are obviously not in and of themselves harmful commodities. In Hammer against Dagenhart the Court was concerned with what it deemed to be an attempt by Congress to use its power over interstate commerce to control acts in the State of origin, which bore no relation to interstate commerce. Here Congress is attempting to prevent the use of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce to accomplish harmful results in other States than the State of origin. Furthermore, the goods made by the child labor were conceded to be harmless and useful. This concession cannot be made as to unregulated holding company securities or the performance of non-arms-length contracts.

C. A third basis for Federal regulation and dissolution of utility holding companies is the familiar power of Congress to prevent monopolies or restraints of trade in interstate commerce. This power is not diminished by the fact that in each local community the operating company normally has a monopoly upon the distribution of electricity. The restraints of trade with which the Federal Government is concerned are those which come from the control by holding companies of the operating companies; such control prevents any competition in the purchase of electricity and of other commodities in interstate commerce by the operating company. It is because of this control and the absence of competition between suppliers of materials and services to the operating companies that the holding company is able to require the operating company to enter into contracts for services and goods on outrageous terms. After this has been done the monopolistic position of the operating company in its community enables this item of "cost" to be passed on to the consumer. To the extent that the great holding companies control the facilities for the interstate distribution of electricity they prevent competition in the interstate transmission of electricity just as did the holding company in Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S. 197) prevent competition between railroads engaged in interstate commerce. The case just cited made plain the power of Congress to prohibit intrastate corporate devices which served to restrain interstate competition. It appears clear that the power of Congress to dissolve the holding companies has the same constitutional foundation as the anti-trust laws.

D. The arguments set forth above have not been based merely upon the general power of Congress to regulate intrastate acts directly affecting interstate commerce but upon particular kinds of regulation upheld by the Supreme Court. There can be no question, however, that the holding-company device directly affects interstate commerce in electricity, in the securities of the holding company, and in the goods, information, and services sent by the holding companies to their subsidiaries. Almost all of the practices which determine the prices of securities sold in interstate commerce and the persons to whom they are sold are subject to the evils of the holding company system of control and distribution. It is also apparent that the price and destination, as well as competition, in the interstate movement of electrical current is directly affected—in fact, controlled—by the fact of the existence of the holding companies. In the same way, all interstate communication and transmission of property between holding company and operating company is directly affected by the fact that the holding company owns the operating company.

The recent opinion of the Supreme Court in Schechter Poultry Corporation v. United States does not indicate that the Federal Government is without power to control intrastate acts so intimately connected with interstate commerce as is the form of organization of the holding company with the commerce in which it is engaged. The Court here drew the line between Federal regulation of intrastate acts which affect interstate commerce "directly" and "indirectly", and held that the Federal power did not extend to regulation of the latter. Thus the local acts of a chicken dealer in selling a product after it had come to rest in New York City were held to affect the prior interstate movement of the poultry only indirectly. The effect upon interstate commerce of such acts was, of course, entirely different from and much less than that of a device which permits certain small groups completely to control interstate commerce in utility securities, intercompany services, and electric current. The Northern Securities case is directly precedent for the Federal power to regulate the form of organization of persons in such a position. Section 7 of the Clayton Act, which prohibits a corporation from acquiring stock in competing companies if such acquisition will tend substantially to lessen interstate competition is another example of the exercise of Federal control over such matters.

DUE PROCESS

The only other serious constitutional question would seem to be whether the due-process clause prevents Congress from abolishing holding companies. If such power exists, no complaint can be made that the particular procedure adopted in section 11 is unreasonable.

There can be no question that the required reorganization of holding companies to the extent of surrendering their control over present subsidiaries will affect the technical property rights of the owners of and investors in such holding companies. But this occurred in the Reading case, in the Northern Securities case, and in the Standard Oil case, all of them herein cited. They may be required to submit to a substitution of liens or of voting rights.

As held in Sanger v. Upton (91 U. S. 56), the stockholder is regarded as an integral part of the corporation and is privy to all proceedings touching the body of which he is a member. And the Northern Securities case clearly recognized the principle that a corporation is not endowed with the inalienable property rights of a natural person.

In no event, however, will the enforcement of the requirement that a holding company cease to be a holding company result in the wiping out of any legitimate property values. It will result merely in the constriction of the present corporate shell without loss or destruction of any of the tangible or earning-power substance that gives it value. Not even any market-flooding or psychological open-market loss need occur, unless temporarily inspired for propaganda purposes by powerful disappointed interests. The essential security readjustments will add nothing to the market volume, inasmuch as the issuance of additional operating-company securities will be balanced by the retirement of an equal volume of holding company securities. The owners of holding company securities, when required to accept substitute securities of operating companies, will continue to have the same ultimate values behind them, whatever those values may be. The reorganization processes will in no sense involve cumbersome or value-destroying marketing operations. In essence they will involve merely the mechanics of appropriate legal administration to the end that equitable redistribution may be made of the evidences of beneficial interest, and all in accordance with the law of the land.

No doubt there are still outstanding many millions of dollars' worth of holding company securities which have no value now and had none when issued, but such unfortunate investors will never get their money back, bill or no bill.

Even in the light of the narrow interpretation of the due-process clause before the case of Nebbia v. New York (291 U. S. 502), there can be no question that utility holding companies were subject to detailed governmental regulation as business "affected with a public interest", and now in the Nebbia case even milk distribution is so classified. Holding companies have been regulated to a considerable extent, though not effectively, by the States. The power of government over public utilities has always been deemed supreme, subject to the qualification, of course, that the regulations must not be arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. With that qualification, the property of the persons engaged in the public-utility industry may be regulated by the proper Government, Federal or State, in whichever sphere the regulation falls. That regulation of business affected with a public interest may take the shape even of prohibition is manifest from cases dealing with the liquor industry (Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S. 623)). In that case the complete value of the investment was destroyed by a straight prohibition law. In the case of the present system of regulation, however, as has been pointed out, the real assets of the industry are unimpaired, and only a corporate shell which has been the cause of many abuses is abolished. In view of the evils caused by the holding company, it cannot be said that the elimination of this form of corporate organization—without depriving investors of the real value of their investments, while at the same time improving the condition of the industry for investors and consumers—is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. The Supreme Court has sanctioned similar methods of regulation requiring changes in the corporate organization of industry. (See Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S. 197); Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S. 1); Continental Insurance Co. v. United States (259 U. S. 156).)

I have been unable to devote the necessary time to a thorough review of the authorities upon the question of delegation of power and its application to the provisions of the committee bill. Section 11 of the committee bill lodges discretion in the Securities and Exchange Commission to permit the continuance of more than one integrated public utility system if found consistent with the public interest, and section 13 permits regulation of intercompany contracts instead of requiring the formation of mutual service companies. It is my best judgment that the recital of practices that are considered contrary to the public interest and the interests of investors and consumers as set forth in section 1 of the committee bill constitute a possibly sufficient standard and guide for Commission action to meet the "canalization" requisites of the Supreme Court. However, this much may be said with certainty, namely, that if sections 11 and 13 of the committee bill meet constitutional limitations from the point of view of delegation of power, sections 11 and 13 of the Senate bill stand on a foundation that cannot be successfully challenged. By Senate section 11 there is no discretionary or conditional power whatever conferred upon the Commission, the congressional fiat being mandatory that all holding companies must cease to be holding companies, except the one in the first degree if it can demonstrate necessity for its existence because of State laws.

By Senate section 13, likewise, directory and unconditional provision is made for the formation of nonprofit mutual service companies to handle all intercompany services, sales, construction, and supervision.

The two bills in these respects are upon an equal footing so far as power under the interstate commerce clause is concerned. If there is any doubt about the further question of delegation of power, that doubt casts much the lightest shadow over the Senate bill.

My time is rapidly passing. I hope my colleagues will read the extension of my remarks in the morning on the question of delegation of power.

I may say in passing that in connection with the important question of delegation of legislative power I see the most vital need for the substitution, in the House bill as reported by our committee, of sections 11 and 13 of the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Iowa 5 additional minutes.

Mr. EICHER. Sections 11 and 13 of the committee bill before the House give discretionary authority to the Commission under section 11, to determine when and under what circumstances, simplification of holding company systems should occur, and under section 13 of the bill as reported to the House the Commission is given supervisory authority over intercompany contracts. I seriously question whether or not that discretionary authority in the case of either of those sections has behind it sufficient standards to meet the "canalization" requisites of the Supreme Court as laid down particularly by Justice Cardozo; but in sections 11 and 13 of the Senate bill Congress has the courage to declare its policy and say to what extent holding company systems shall break themselves down. No discretion is lodged in any commission on that subject.

Likewise in section 13 of the Senate bill the Congress has the courage to declare that intercompany contracts are against public policy and that the rendition of intercompany services must be put in the hands of a mutual service company, operating without profit for the benefit of the operating companies comprising the system.

May I venture a few closing observations that I trust my colleagues will not regard as designedly didactic or dogmatic? Unconstitutionalism has come to be a favorite red herring for special and privileged interests to drag across the trail of their reprehensible business practices whenever the public weal is asserted. Shall Congress, the first of our governmental triumvirate to be established in the Constitution, supinely and entirely cease to function for fear of disapproval by the third? No, my fellow Members; the official duties the people have elected us to perform may not be so easily eluded. The issues involved in the pending legislation are far too important to submit to the arbitrament of legalistic hairsplitting by Members whose opposition goes far deeper than any question of alleged doubtful constitutionality. Which side are we on in this present-day irrepressible conflict that awaits our decision? Of its ultimate outcome there can be no doubt. Either this Congress, of which you and I are Members, will promote the general welfare by reaching the right decision or a later Congress, of which you and I may not be Members, will do it instead. Political liberty without economic liberty is the merest mockery. The curse of concentrated economic and financial power, exerted with other people's money, threatens the existence of our institutions. It must and will be banished from the land! [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, public-utility holding-company legislation may be either a reform or a menace. The ultimate result depends upon the type of legislation enacted.

The controversy which has developed since the introduction of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill has found expression in two clearly defined viewpoints. The adherents of each acknowledge that certain practices, in the nature of evils or abuses, have in some instances crept into the system. The divergent views result from a difference of opinion as to what should be the manner of treatment.

The Wheeler-Rayburn bill was drawn upon the theory that no essential good could be accomplished by a continuance of the present holding-company set-up, and the public interest required its complete elimination as a part of our economic structure by the so-called "death sentence" provisions of the bill.

The opposing viewpoint, and with which I concur, recognizes the necessity and the propriety of eradicating the evils that have been practiced by "some", and by strict regulation and control prevent the possibility of their recurrence in the future. Those who hold this viewpoint deny that it is necessary to "kill" in order to "cure."

A short time ago I read in the Philadelphia Record an editorial that forcibly, logically, and clearly presents this latter viewpoint. The editorial to which I refer takes on additional importance from the fact that the Philadelphia Record is owned and published by J. David Stern, personal friend of President Roosevelt and stanch supporter of his administration. The editorial was also published in the New York Post and Camden Evening Courier and Morning

Post, all of which are publications of Mr. Stern, and reads as follows:

SINKING THE SHIP TO STOP THE LEAKS

Salutary in its intention is the Federal utility holding-company bill introduced in the Senate by Senator WHEELER and in the House by Representative RAYBURN.

Those intentions are elimination of the evils which have arisen in the system of utility holding companies.

But the act itself would go far beyond those intentions; it would abolish holding companies wholesale during the next 5 years.

The Record has long urged effective regulation of utility holding companies. It has been one of the few newspapers in the country to fight the atrocious abuses to which the holding-company device has been subjected.

But we don't believe in sinking a ship to stop leaks.

We do not believe general abolition of holding companies will benefit the public, the utility consumers, or anybody else.

Such drastic proposals may not be seriously entertained by those who have made them. It is recognized practice in national as well as international bargaining to ask twice what you want so you can cut your demands in half and still win. Indeed, there already is talk of compromise on the Wheeler-Rayburn bill.

But the measure as it stands is an economic paradox.

There should be drastic consolidations of utilities. Where a utility holding company owns 90 percent or more of another utility company, consolidation should be mandatory. Rights of minority stockholders could be safeguarded through legislation.

Further, it is essential that all utilities be compelled to accept uniform accounting.

Again, there is absolutely no excuse for multiple-layer holding companies, some of which have been piled upon each other to a total of eight layers. Reorganization should bring these structures down to three layers immediately, eventually to two layers—that is, with not more than one holding company above the affiliated operating utilities.

Yet, again, it is essential that all intercompany transactions, whether between operating companies or between operating companies and holding companies, should be conducted as though they were transactions between different departments of one business.

But to wipe out the holding companies generally in one fell swoop—even though the process be spread out over 5 years—would be futile, dangerous, and unjust.

Such a process would constitute automatic robbery of thousands of stockholders.

Even though a utility company might have 5 years in which to liquidate, by selling its holdings in operating companies, the immediate effect would be a disastrous drop in the value of both the holding-company and operating-company stock.

Any fair market for utility stock would be destroyed. A fair price is generally regarded as that price agreed upon by a willing seller, not compelled to sell, and a willing buyer, not compelled to buy. In this case the seller would be compelled to sell. And the public knowledge of that compulsion would drive down stock values—with repercussions that would affect banks, insurance companies, and the thousands of individuals who have invested in those stocks.

Passage of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill would thus set in motion a tremendous wave of deflation, which would strike not only at the utility holding companies and their stockholders but at the economic system of the country.

Beyond all this is the simple factor of elementary justice.

Over a period of 50 years the Government permitted the holding company system to develop—and sat by indifferent while abuses sprang up.

In spite of those abuses the holding company served a useful purpose. The present coordinated network of power facilities, which reaches into every corner of the country, could not have been achieved without the holding company. And without that coordination power rates today would be even higher than they are—with less hope of bringing them down.

Because some utility holding companies have been guilty of defrauding the public—often their stockholders as well as consumers—is no reason why all holding companies should be put out of business.

As we have said many times before it would have been far better for the country and for the utilities themselves if they had shown more disposition to clean their own house, if they had used their power to throw out the financial racketeers and stock jobbers who brought so many of them into disrepute.

It is impossible, however, to unscramble an egg.

It is equally impossible to unscramble the entire holding-company system without needless hardship and intolerable injury to the entire country.

Utility reform is necessary. But it need not be either destructive or confiscatory.

If the ship is leaking, plug up the leaks. Let Uncle Sam even take over the helm through regulation. But to sink the vessel, crew and all, is simply suicide.

The issue is not whether there should be effective regulation and control to eliminate evils found to exist in a holding-company structure but whether there should be in addition thereto the power to destroy. Those of us who support the regulatory feature of the proposed legislation and oppose the destructive features do so in the belief, and with the conviction that the right to destroy and confiscate, even in the name of reform, is neither constitutional nor just. Adequate regulation and control, yes. Destruction and confiscation, no.

The bill reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as a substitute for the Wheeler-Rayburn measure contains sufficient regulatory provisions to adequately control, eliminate, and prevent any and all of the so-called "evils" with which some holding companies are alleged to have been identified in the past; and this can be accomplished without utilizing the "death" clause. Section 11 of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill as it passed the Senate, or as rewritten in the House bill, could be eliminated entirely without destroying the effectiveness of either bill. Each would continue to be a strong and comprehensive regulatory bill with sufficient teeth to provide every safeguard for the protection of investor and consumer.

The evils which it is the purpose of this legislation to correct are set forth in section 1 of the original bill as follows:

(1) The securities of such public-utility holding companies, subsidiary companies, and affiliates are sold to a large number of investors in different States; (2) such investors cannot obtain the information necessary to appraise the financial position or earning power of such issuers because of the absence of uniform standard accounts; (3) such securities are frequently issued without the approval or consent of the States having jurisdiction over subsidiary public-utility companies; (4) such securities are often issued upon the basis of fictitious asset values and of paper profits from intercompany transactions and hence do not accurately reflect the sums invested in underlying public-utility properties; (5) such securities are often issued in anticipation of excessive revenues from subsidiaries which if realized would burden consumers, and the failure to realize such revenues, because of State regulation of subsidiary public-utility companies, results in loss to investors who have been led to believe that such revenues are a legitimate part of the issuer's income; (6) such securities, when improvidently issued, subject subsidiary public-utility companies to the burden of supporting an overcapitalized superstructure, to the detriment of investors and consumers, and tend to prevent voluntary rate reductions which over a period of time might promote a greater and more economic use of gas and electric energy and thereby strengthen subsidiary public-utility companies; (7) subsidiary public-utility companies are often subjected to excessive charges for services, construction work, equipment, and materials to the detriment of investors and consumers; (8) subsidiary public-utility companies often enter into transactions with affiliates in which the absence of arm's length bargaining operates to the detriment of investors and consumers; (9) control of subsidiary public-utility companies throughout the United States has often been used to secure to holding companies, their affiliates, and subsidiary construction companies construction work for public-utility companies in restraint of free and independent competition in that field; (10) service, management, construction, and other contracts involve the allocation of charges among subsidiary public-utility companies in different States and present problems of regulation which cannot be dealt with effectively by the States; (11) control of subsidiary public-utility companies materially affects the accounting practices and rate, dividend, and other policies of such companies, thereby in many instances complicating and obstructing State regulation of such subsidiary companies; (12) the growth and extension of holding companies in some cases have borne no relation to the economies of management and operation or to the integration and coordination of related properties, but have been influenced by a desire for economic power and security profits and have tended toward the concentration and monopolization in a few holding-company systems of control of gas and electric utility companies to the detriment of investors, consumers, and the general public.

Every alleged evil appearing in this indictment of holding-company practices has been provided against in the revised House bill. A careful reading of the bill will convince any honest mind that no effort has been spared to adequately and completely eradicate the evils and make impossible their recurrence in the future. It is equally plain that this desirable result is fully possible without utilizing the destructive features of section 11 of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, either as it was originally introduced or as it passed the Senate, or even in the modified form in which it appears in the present bill. Thus there can be no justification for granting powers that would permit arbitrary and capricious action to the detriment of innocent investors and without any resultant benefit to the consuming public.

In this connection, consideration should also be given to the fact that the hearings do not reveal a single instance where any evil practice complained of, and the subject of correction by this legislation, has occurred since the enactment of the Securities Act of 1933 or the Stock Exchange Act of 1934. Every illustration presented to the committee by the proponents of this legislation was prior in point of time to the passage of such acts. This fact indicates that regulatory laws already passed are effective in protecting the public interest, and when further strengthened by the regulatory provisions of this bill, make unnecessary the further grant of confiscatory power.

If further assurance is desired as to the effectiveness of regulatory control of holding-company structures, it is only necessary to study the worth-while results that have been attained by the railroad holding-company legislation enacted in 1933. The evils alleged to be incident to such type of holding company were no different in principle from those now under consideration, yet regulation in such case has been sufficient to control and curb practices not considered to be in the public interest. There is no such confiscatory powers provided in that legislation as is now sought by the advocates of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. The desired result was obtained by "regulation" without "destruction." Equally desirable results can be obtained by applying the same type of legislation to public-utility holding companies as was applied to railroad holding companies.

Time and again the efficacy of sound regulatory legislation has been demonstrated in dealing with acknowledged wrongful practices in other fields of industrial endeavor. The evils that developed by unrestrained operation of railroads, such as rebating and other practices contrary to the public interest, finally created a necessity for legislation. The legislation that resulted, however, was regulatory and not confiscatory in character. It did not seek to dismember railroad systems to stop the evils. The evils were prohibited and the systems continued intact. What has already been done can be done again by the enactment of similar legislation.

Not only is confiscatory legislation unnecessary but it is unjust to innocent investors who hold the stock of the affected companies. To enact the "death sentence" in any form, and no matter how distant the day, will result in unnecessary destruction of legitimate values and property. Such action will prove highly deflationary and thus add to the heavy losses which the people have already experienced. This is the expectation of all thoughtful persons except the sponsors of the act. Thus, to the losses which have already been suffered as a result of mismanagement or abuse of power by financial interests and from the general decline in values incident to the business depression, there will be added the losses due to the action of the Government itself.

To grant the power sought by the Wheeler-Rayburn bill will place in the hands of a Federal bureau or commission the right to destroy by compulsory liquidation and reorganization, under most unfavorable circumstances, a large part of what little remains to investors in utility holding-company securities.

The destruction of the remaining value of holding-company securities would destroy the last chance to which so many people have hopefully clung, namely, that when general economic conditions improve some measure of their investment values will be restored.

Wholesale reorganization under pressure, threat, and bureaucratic dictation will afford most unusual opportunities for the sharp and the clever. The small investors' chances are substantially less than nothing if such a plan is put into operation.

Throughout the committee hearings it was apparent that the proponents of this legislation, including the power of liquidation or dissolution of existing utility holding companies, did not appreciate the tremendous difficulties that would arise from a general uprooting of long-established utility systems with intricate financial, economic, and operating problems; nor did they give any satisfying assurance as to how such dissolutions or liquidations could be effected without virtual confiscation of the savings of millions of legitimate investors in the securities of those public-utility holding companies which this proposed legislation would order out of existence.

Time and again, from the beginning to the end of the committee hearings, requests were addressed to the proponents of the legislation, who appeared before the committee, that they present for the consideration of the committee a plan by which dissolution or liquidation could be effected without occasioning loss to investors, particularly those holding common stock. In each instance willingness to comply with the request was expressed. I regret, however, that although more than 4 months have elapsed since the first request was made and promise given, there has been no fulfillment. It may be due to lack of serious consideration, a failure to appreciate the importance of the subject, or just plain inability to provide a workable plan. Probably the latter is the real answer.

In the case of farm and home owners, the Federal Government became so concerned over the preservation of their equities and over the effect of forced sales upon the market prices of farm and home property, that it created Federal agencies for Government refinancing of such property, to the end that the owners might not be deprived of the savings represented by their equities. It was recognized that the demoralized market values incident to distress selling were not representative of real or intrinsic values, and the Government even went so far as to countenance the legality of State moratorium laws designed to stay foreclosure proceedings in a period of unparalleled depression in order that owners might not be deprived of their equities in a market characterized by compulsory sales.

In the case of the electric-utility industry over $12,000,000,000 has been invested by thrifty American citizens in order to make electric service available to thousands of communities and millions of customers. But contrast with the Government's policy in the case of farm and home owners, which has been to preserve the owners' equities and to reduce compulsory and sacrifice selling, the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, which, with its dissolution and liquidation features, is apparently predicated on a diametrically opposed policy of compelling the holding companies to throw the stock of public-utility operating companies on the market for whatever they will bring. It is foolish to expect that the resulting sacrifice sale prices will represent intrinsic values. The inevitable result will be the practical confiscation of the savings of millions of honest American investors.

Why should investors in utility securities, many of whom have placed their entire hard-earned life savings in this type of investment, be singled out to suffer from the destructive forces of governmental intervention? The legislation is drawn upon the theory that the holding-company structure is a device adopted by this industry and no other, and with no other thought and purpose than to deceive and take advantage of investor and consumer alike. Those who so claim ignore entirely the fact that the holding company was in existence before the electric industry was born and that no national industry has yet been built, nor does one operate today, without using its counterpart, in one form or another. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. became a holding company in 1832 and appears to have been the earliest holding company in the United States. Other illustrations are the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 1853; Chicago & North Western Railway Co., 1864; the Western Union Telegraph Co., 1851; and many others too numerous to mention.

In the gas and electric field a notable example is the charter of the United Gas Improvement Co. in 1885, which had been originally granted to the Union Contract Co. by the Pennsylvania Legislature in 1870. Consolidated Gas Co. of New York was incorporated in 1884. The North American Co. in 1890.

The wide-spread use of the holding company in every line of industrial endeavor clearly indicates that its use is not peculiar to the electric and gas industry. Berle and Means, writing in 1934 on the Modern Corporation and Private Property, are authority for the statement that of 573 active corporations whose securities were listed on the recognized stock exchange, 487 were holding companies, or combination holding and operating companies, divided by type of holdings as follows: Industrial 407, railroads 46, and utilities 34. Furthermore, it is not a device unknown to the Federal Government itself. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Federal Reserve System, the Tennessee Valley Authority are but illustrations of a much greater number. In fact, high officials of the Government have procured from the State of Delaware and are now utilizing in governmental activities, holding-company charters which exceed the authority and power granted by the charters of many of the utility holding companies which are now and have been the subject of criticism.

I have made this reference to the wide-spread use of the holding-company theory of corporate structure, not only by private industry but also by governmental agencies, in order that it may clearly appear that there is nothing inherently wrong in its underlying principles or theory. If it were otherwise, then there would be no right for its continued existence in any field of endeavor or its use by the Government itself. Therefore, if the thing itself is not necessarily wrong, and as it can be utilized properly and in a way beneficial to the public interest, then there exists no necessity for its abolition in the utility field but only for its proper regulation. Such a method would insure its use as an agency in the public interest.

I have sought to point out in the time allotted to me that there is neither reason nor excuse for Congress to go beyond a strict regulatory bill. I am satisfied that the alleged evils found to exist in some utility companies, but not found in all, can be adequately and fully corrected and eliminated by the regulatory provisions of the pending House bill, without the "death sentence", with its attendant loss to millions of our people, who, by thrift and hard work, have saved and invested in the utility type of security. Otherwise, the innocent will be punished for the acts of the guilty. This is not just. I am as sincere as anyone in this House in my desire to provide legislation that will completely curb and make impossible any unconscionable practices in the future, but I am not willing to confiscate the earnings of innocent investors. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question before he begins his statement?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes; I am glad to yield to my colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I know the distinguished member of the committee has made a most careful study of this pending legislation. It has been generally understood about Washington that the Department of Justice has given its approval to the constitutionality of the Senate measure. Is this true?

Mr. PETTENGILL. It is not correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Has the gentleman any information which would throw light upon it?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I have in my pocket a letter from the Attorney General of the United States to that effect.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Would the gentleman be so good as to read the letter?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I shall be glad to do so. There is nothing confidential about it. It is an official letter from the Attorney General. I may say to my friend from West Virginia that as I have been interested in the constitutionality of the Senate bill from the beginning, I wrote to the Attorney General on May 29, as follows:

Hon. HOMER B. CUMMINGS,
Attorney General of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CUMMINGS: I am one of six members of a subcommittee considering title I of the public-utility bill.

It has been stated that your office sometime last fall or early winter made a study of the bill as to its constitutionality.

Is this information correct? And if so, will you kindly furnish me for the use of the committee a copy of your conclusions?

As this matter is pressing, I would appreciate a reply at your earliest convenience.

Faithfully yours,

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL.

MAY 29, 1935.

I received this reply on May 31, 1935:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 31, 1935.

Hon. SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN PETTENGILL: I have your letter inquiring whether this Department has made a study of the public-utility bill as to its constitutionality; and if so, requesting a copy of my conclusions.

I have not rendered any opinion on the question to which you refer, and therefore I regret that I am unable to comply with your request.

With kind regards, sincerely yours,

HOMER CUMMINGS,
Attorney General.

I will say to my friend from West Virginia that I have made other inquiries and I can state on the highest authority that nobody in the Department down to the youngest law clerk has ever given either an official or an unofficial approval of the Senate bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the gentleman; that was my understanding.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the brilliant speeches which have been made this afternoon, I am not going to try to make a speech, strictly speaking. I am going to attempt to make a surgical dissection of the body of living death that is found in section 11 of the Senate bill. I shall confine my remarks entirely to section 11 of the Senate bill, and I will say that it will not embarrass me to have a roll-call vote on this matter, because if there were 20 roll calls on it, I would vote against it 20 times. [Applause.]

My time is exceedingly limited and I am obliged to decline to be interrupted. In debate under the 5-minute rule I shall do my best to answer any questions with respect to section 11 of the Senate bill.

My general views on the bill are set forth first in a separate report which you will find at the back of the committee report; second, in a discussion of the constitutional questions involved with respect to the death sentence in the bill, to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Thursday, June 20, page 9787; and third, in a radio speech given Tuesday night which my friend from Kentucky, Mr. MAY, had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday of this week, page 10177.

In my separate report I described the superstructure holding company as a legal monstrosity and a social wrong. I do not defend it nor the evil practices which have grown up under it. The only difference of opinion between myself and some of my colleagues is with respect to the remedy to be applied.

The passion and prejudice which have been aroused on this matter were very largely deserved. I hold no brief for the Power Trust. I never owned a dime's worth of their securities, nor in many years at the bar have I ever represented any of them. The crooks in the industry richly deserve to be hanged. I am certain, however, that the Senate bill will hang the country upon the gallows erected for the crooks. The "death sentence" in the Senate bill will cause great damage to the country but will hang no crooks. I am so clearly convinced the "death sentence" will not endure for a single day in the Supreme Court of the United States that I believe those who vote for it either wittingly or ignorantly will be playing into the hands of the Power Trust. Unconstitutional legislation will not affect it. Meantime, however, the doubt and uncertainty pending a Supreme Court decision will delay national recovery and the reabsorption of our idle men, to the infinite harm of the industry and the Nation as a whole.

I approach this question entirely along the lines laid down by Woodrow Wilson. In an address in 1912 in honor of Andrew Jackson he said:

This man must be a radical, because if he sees the thing that way, what in God's name is he going to do, because if he is going to go to work to thoroughly change those facts there is no telling where he will stop. Now, it is just there that he ought to stop being radical. If the prudent surgeon wants to save the patient, he has got absolutely to know the naked anatomy of the man. He has got to know what is under his skin and in his intestines; he has got to be absolutely indecent in his scrutiny. And then he has got to say to himself: "I know where the seat of life is; I know where my knife should penetrate; I dare not go too far for fear it should touch the fountain of vitality. In order to save this beautiful thing I must cut deep, but I must cut carefully; I must cut out the things that are decayed and rotten; the things that manifest disease; and I must leave every honest, wholesome tissue absolutely untouched.

What does the "death sentence" in the Senate bill do? It does three things:

First. After January 1, 1938, it makes it the duty of the Commission to require each registered holding company and each subsidiary company, which means other holding and all operating companies in the system, to divest itself of any interest in any of its properties to the extent that the Commission finds necessary to limit the operations of the holding-company system of which such company is a part, to a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

Second. After January 1, 1938, to require each registered holding company and each subsidiary company to be reorganized or dissolved whenever the Commission finds that the corporate structure or continued existence of any such company unduly complicates the structure of the holding company of which it is a part, or unfairly or inequitably distributes voting power among the holders of its securities, or is detrimental to the functioning of a single geographically and economically integrated public-utility system.

Third. After January 1, 1940, to require each registered holding company to cease to be a holding company either by divesting itself of its securities, or by dissolution or otherwise. It is provided that the Commission, upon such terms and conditions as it may find necessary, shall permit a registered holding company in the first degree to continue to be such, if such company obtains from the Federal Power Commission a commutation of the "death sentence." The "death sentence", however, is mandatory and compulsory on all holding companies beyond the first degree.

All holding companies and their subsidiaries, which include operating companies whether solvent or not, in compliance with any orders issued, can be thrown into receivership.

Any and all plans for reorganization must be approved by the Commission rather than by the court.

Section 3 permits the Commission to exempt certain holding companies and their subsidiaries if predominantly intrastate, and so forth, from the provisions of the bill. All such exemptions, however, are subject to revocation at any time by the Commission in its sole judgment and discretion.

It has been said that the "death sentence" will not affect operating companies. This is not the fact. The "death sentence" affects them both directly and indirectly. As I have just stated, every operating company in the United States, if a subsidiary of a holding company, under the bill may be compulsory reorganized or dissolved if the Commission in its sole discretion finds that such operating company unduly complicates the holding-company system of which it is a part or is detrimental to the functioning of a single integrated system, or has what the Commission considers an unfair distribution of its voting power. If the Commission thinks that the preferred stock of the operating company should be given the power to vote, the company may be reorganized. If the Commission thinks that the operating company's bond or debenture holders should be given the power to vote, such company may be reorganized or dissolved. Voting power enjoyed by common stock may be taken away from such stockholders and given to preferred-stock holders or bond holders.

Despite the fact that preferred stock and bonds were purchased without the power to vote and in strict accordance with the charter of the company and the fundamental law of the State of its creation, this section would take from common-stock holders at the whim of the Commission the property right enjoyed, and I think protected by the fifth amendment to the Constitution. The Commission therefore may rewrite the stock and bond contracts of the operating company security holders.

Whether a preferred stock issued at $100 or a bond issued at $100 should have 20 votes or 1 vote as against common stock issued at $5 is not stated. That is left entirely to the Commission.

It seems obvious that whatever decision the Commission arrives at with respect to what is a fair and equitable distribution of voting power between common, preferred, and bond holders would have to be applied uniformly throughout the United States with respect to all operating companies.

If one system for the distribution of voting power in operating companies is adopted for some companies and another system is adopted for other companies, how can both be fair or equitable? Each will brand the other as "unfair."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, if not applied uniformly, what the Commission decides would be fair in one State would not be fair in another State or with another company. The Commission cannot have two or more rules of thumb with respect to what is a fair distribution of voting power; otherwise the whole thing lacks uniformity and becomes capricious and arbitrary. If the Commission decides to give the preferred-stock and bond holders voting power it is obvious that in many cases the control of the company will pass from the common-stock holders to the senior security holders, because bonds and preferred stock are nearly always much greater in amount than common stock. This would give the senior security holders, with a new voting power vested in them, the power, if they saw fit, to wind up or sell the company at a price which might pay them off in full because they have the senior position and leave the common-stock holders occupying the junior position, with nothing whatever for their investment.

In the Old Testament a mark of blood was left on the lintel of the door so that the Angel of Death might pass by and leave that household unharmed. This bill exempts no operating company which is a subsidiary of a holding company, under the bill, from being marked for dissolution or reorganization.

Dissolved or reorganized, not knowing where the voting power in operating companies is finally to rest, how can any operating company in the United States secure money for its extensions, its improvements, the purchase of heavy machinery, in which the great amount of our unemployment exists, and the reabsorption of millions now on the dole? In the next few years what man will buy common stocks of operating companies, not knowing whether the contract under which he buys and invests his savings will be worth a tinker's darn 3 or 5 years from now? What man will buy operating-company common stocks or even continue to hold the common stocks he already possesses with this uncertainty whether he will have a voice in the election of the managers and directors of the business in which his investment is made? If any bill could be written which would more completely hamstring and retard the development and growth of the operating companies of this Nation, than the present bill, it is altogether beyond my imagination.

Let us next consider the indirect effect of this bill upon the operating companies of the Nation and their securities. Contrary to the opinion entertained by some that it will not affect the underlying bonds and preferred and common stocks of operating companies, I believe the opposite can be demonstrated like a proposition in geometry.

There are about $12,000,000,000 of actual investments in the light and power utilities of the country. On the blackboard I have a simple diagram showing the situation—not accurately, but roughly. There are about $6,000,000,000 of the underlying bonds of operating companies, about $3,000,000,000 of preferred stock of operating companies, and about three billion of the common stocks of operating companies. Generally speaking, the bonds and preferred stock are in the hands of the public, although some of each are held by holding companies. The three billion of common stock of the operating companies is largely held by the holding companies and constitutes the chief asset of the holding companies. Against this common-stock asset the holding company in turn issues its bonds and debentures, its preferred stock, and its common stock, all of which, in the main, are in the hands of the public.

With an absolute "death sentence" lying over the heads of all holding companies beyond the first degree, and a discretionary "death sentence" lying over holding companies in the first degree, what is the result? Let us take up a number of different situations. I do not say that all or even any of the anticipated results will follow in any one particular case. Some of them, however, in my judgment, are bound to follow, and in that event the doubt and uncertainty lying over the future relations between operating and holding companies will tend to put an end to investment in operating and holding companies, will tend to impair still further the values of holding-company bonds, preferred stock, and common stock, and, reaching from them, it will tend to further depreciate the values of the common and preferred stocks and bonds of operating companies.

Situation no. 1: The holding company owns bonds of operating companies or has advanced its funds on open account to the operating company. The holding company, however, is now facing dissolution, reorganization, or conversion into an investment trust. Heretofore the operating company has looked in large part to the holding company as a market for its common stocks as well as general financing, and could expect in most instances that its bonds or accounts owing to the holding company would not be called for payment or would be extended and renewed at maturity to meet the convenience of the operating company and its need to use its funds in further extensions to its plant rather than in the liquidation of its debts. The holding company, however, facing dissolution, will almost inevitably require payment of the bonds and obligations owing it by the operating company. In such case how will the operating company provide the funds to meet its obligations? It will conserve its cash for that purpose. It will maintain a liquid position for that purpose. It will probably pass its dividends on its preferred stock in order to have cash to meet its maturing obligations. The passing of its dividends on its preferred and common stock will tend, of course, to drive their values still further down. Conserving its cash, the operating company will curtail extensions and improvements as much as possible. To the extent that it does so it will fail to employ labor, pay for machinery and equipment, and contribute to national recovery.

Situation no. 2: The holding company has outstanding its own bonds and debentures and preferred stock, possibly callable at a premium of $105. The holding company, to obtain cash to retire its own bonds and preferred stock, would, of course, sell the only asset it has, which is the common stock of the operating companies. None of its preferred-stock holders or bond holders could be compelled to take operating company stocks in payment. They are in a position to demand cash. The sale by the holding company of its operating-company common stocks would depress their value on the market, especially because they would be sold, first, under time pressure; second, in a period of possible continuing depression; third, to buyers who know nothing of the value of the individual operating-company common stocks, which heretofore have not been listed on an exchange and do not have investment standing because unknown in the money markets, and without the advantage of diversification; fourth, because sold to a comparatively limited field of buyers, due to the fact that if any buyer acquired as much as 10 percent of the common stock of the operating company he himself, although an individual, becomes a holding company under the definition in the bill; fifth, because the stocks that will be sold will be the operating company's common stock, which will now be subject to divorcement of voting power and in some instances to new and drastic regulation provided by the bill; sixth, because the sale would take place in a stagnant market, with possible buyers frightened with respect to the whole future of the industry, and to buyers who, as stated above, did not know whether the voting control incident to the common stock of the operating company may be taken from such buyers and transferred to the preferred stock and bond holders of the operating company.

If the operating-company common stocks are sold on the market by holding companies to make funds with which to meet their own bonds and preferred stocks it would tend to depress still further the market value of the operating-company's preferred stock and bonds. This would in turn make it still more difficult to find buyers for new issues of bonds or preferred stock for plant extension, again retarding the reemployment of our idle men.

This liquidation and dumping overboard by holding companies of their operating-company stocks would take place when all other holding companies are facing either the certainty or the likelihood of reorganization or dissolution.

Situation no. 3: In some cases the operating company's bonds or preferred stock are guaranteed by the holding company. The dissolution of the holding company would, of course, wipe out the guaranty. Its conversion into an investment trust would impair the value of the guaranty because the holding company is no longer a going concern. The destruction or impairment of the value of the guaranty of the holding company would further tend to depress the market value of the operating company bonds or preferred stock so guaranteed. This would tend to increase to the operating company the financing cost and interest rate of refunding operating-company bond issues and thus increase the difficulty of the operating company in getting money for its plant extensions.

Situation no. 4: Heretofore the holding company in many instances has furnished the market and the only market for many operating companies for their common stock. The operating company's common stock is a cushion underneath its bonds and preferred stock so long as the operating company has a market for its common stock and with this cushion under its bonds and preferred, the latter tend to be sold at a lower dividend and interest rate. The lower because the operating company is able to sell its senior securities, the less are its fixed charges, and the less, of course, it can sell its power and light, the less are its rates to its customers. If the holding-company market for operating-company common is destroyed or impaired the cushion behind operating preferred stock and bonds is impaired and the cost of its senior money will rise with adverse effect on its power and light rates to its customers. It should be pointed out that while the operating company may be able to sell its bonds and preferred stock to residents of its own territory, in many cases it is not able to sell its common stock which is the less desirable because in a junior position, and, further, because the operating company common, say in a town in Kansas or Texas, has never been listed on a stock exchange, does not have a quick cash market, is not known to investors, and does not enjoy a diversification of risk.

Situation no. 5: The holding company has its own bonds and preferred stock in the hands of the public. Facing dissolution or reorganization or conversion into an investment trust in a situation where such bondholders and stockholders may demand cash, the holding company, of course, will conserve its cash to retire, first, its bonds, and, second, its preferred stock. The holding company will tend to stop paying dividends on its preferred and common to make assets to meet its bonds. Its directors in effect become trustees in liquidation and cannot personally afford to take the chance of continuing dividends on preferred and common for fear that its assets will not be sufficient to pay its bonds and preferred stock in full.

The same result will tend to be true with respect to the operating company which owes the holding company either on open account or bonds. The operating company will also tend to conserve its cash and to do so will pass dividends on its common and preferred because the operating company knows that it has heavy obligations maturing to the holding company which it cannot expect to be renewed.

The operating company conserving its cash to meet its obligations to the holding company will tend to drop some of its employees or reduce their wages, thus adding to the national problem of unemployment. With the future fate of the holding company uncertain, or if permitted to live after 1940 with the question uncertain how much of its property it may continue to own and how much it may be required to divest itself of, it will add to the sum total of national uncertainty. The tendency to pass dividends on both holding preferred and common and operating preferred and common will further frighten investors, present and prospective, with a tendency to further depreciate all stock and all bonds of all companies whether in the light and power industry or not.

When investors become frightened, they become frightened, and do not in many instances stop to analyze situations exactly. If a horse thinks that a stump is a bear it is almost as hard to get the horse to go around the stump as if it were a bear. If the effect of the "death sentence" in the Senate bill should increase uncertainty and fear, banks and bank examiners will call loans collateralized by operating- and holding-company securities, which would tend to further depress their value and further shrink bank credit.

As large insurance companies have 9 percent of their assets in utility securities, with this uncertainty over the future of their securities, they will be less apt to continue dividends against insurance premiums. There are about 65,000,000 separate individuals whose lives are insured in ordinary, fraternal, industrial, or group insurance, and the uncertainty created by the "death sentence" in the Senate bill will thus tend to affect adversely the savings of 65,000,000 Americans, or an average of 150,000 persons in each congressional district.

To the extent that holding-company management has been honest and efficient the loss of economies of mass buying, legal, engineering, construction, and tax services, due to the dissolution, reorganization or conversion into an investment trust of holding companies will tend to increase the operating costs of the operating companies, decrease the value of their securities, and tend to increase rates to their consumers.

"Milking" should be eliminated by strict regulation rather than destruction.

The holding company has, we will say, three integrated systems not connected. It knows it can only hope to own one of these systems and does not know which one it will be permitted to own. In this case is it likely that it will continue in the next few years to advance money for extension of the physical properties of its operating companies in one or more of its systems, not knowing whether 5 years from now it can get back such new investment. This is like a farmer owning three farms in three different States, all of which need new fences, draining, paint, and so forth. Will the farmer willingly add to his investment in any one of these farms knowing that a few years from now he must sell one or more of the farms and not knowing which one he must sell? I leave to your imagination the effect of this on national recovery.

It is argued that the holding company can distribute to its common-stock holders the common stock of the operating companies in its portfolios. Let us assume that the holding company has 100,000 shares of its common stock in the hands of the public; that it has in its portfolio 50,000 shares of operating company no. 1, 5,000 shares of operating company no. 2, 7,000 shares of operating company no. 3, and so forth. Assume that these operating-company common stocks are distributed to the common-stock holders of the holding company. In that case for each share of holding-company common stock the holders will get one-half of a share of operating company no. 1, one-twentieth of a share of operating company no. 2, seven one-hundredths of a share of operating company no. 3 as his pro rata distribution. This is really a simple case. In some instances the fraction would be as small as one-millionth of a share. Such distribution would, therefore scatter infinitesimally small fractions of shares which do not have investment status, which are unknown to buyers and unregistered on the stock exchange. There will be heavy brokerage fees to convert these fractional shares into full shares. The holding-company common-stock holder will be apt to sell all fractional shares in one operating company in order to convert his investment into the shares of another operating company, and thus would lose diversification of risk and actually the holding-company common-stock holders would be no nearer to the operating company's physical properties than they were before. Unless converted into whole shares the large number of outstanding fractional shares would increase the expense of operating companies in distributing their reports and paying their dividends, if any are paid, and the adverse effect of all this upon the value of operating-company securities may be imagined.

It should not be overlooked that this distribution or sale by holding companies of operating-company common stocks would be on a market frightened in advance by the uncertainty existing as to the further extension of competing properties financed out of the United States Treasury, such as the T. V. A. and Boulder Dam and other huge plants, as well as the advance of P. W. A. funds for municipal plants.

It should not be overlooked that no possible buyer of operating-company common stocks could afford to buy as much as 10 percent without himself becoming a holding company subject to all the provisions and penalties of the act.

The diffusion by holding companies of operating-company common stock into unidentifiable ownership without common direction or management would make operating-company senior securities more difficult to sell except at prohibitive interest and dividend rates or discounts. The result would tend to be that operating companies would have to look to the United States Treasury for their financing, with the further trend toward the nationalization of the industry.

It is for these reasons, among others, that I am convinced the drastic treatment of holding companies would tend to impair the value of operating-company securities and tend in these critical years to make more difficult and expensive the further growth and extension of the physical properties of operating companies, and thus be so harmful to national recovery, and what is most important, the reabsorption of our unemployed.

This one industry, if it knew its future, is capable in the next 5 years of spending as much money on plant extensions, and so forth, as the total gigantic $4,000,000,000 Public Works program, and in so doing would create no debt for future generations of taxpayers to pay.

As I have tried to make perfectly clear, I do not defend the evil practices which have grown up under the holding-company system, nor do I defend the holding-company structure. I think, however, that on account of legislation already passed the evils are on their way out and that the holding-company superstructure itself will be gradually simplified without the drastic provisions of the Senate bill. All of this I have set out in the brief supplemental report which I have filed and which I ask leave to be incorporated as part of my remarks.

Mr. FORD of California. What are the assets of the holding company?

Mr. PETTENGILL. The assets of the holding company are the common stocks of the operating companies.

Mr. FORD of California. That guarantees those bonds, and that is a good guaranty?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I will answer the question, because I see what is in the gentleman's mind. The operating company may be an operating company in Marion, Ind., but the holding company will have the assets not only of that operating company but will own the common stock of many other operating companies, and will have pooled behind the guaranty of the bonds of one company the common stocks of many operating companies. It is like a life-insurance company which has the pooled assets of many to meet the liability of one.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take any more time, because I know there are many others who wish to speak. I thank you, and I am going to ask the privilege of extending my remarks. My whole point, if I may say so, is that I am trying to demonstrate that this bill, if it is enacted into law with section 11 of the Senate bill in it, will affect the bonds and the preferred and common stocks of the operating companies as well as the holding companies of the United States; and if the gentleman wants to know my general views on the situation as to what I think ought to be done, I hope he will read my separate report.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield to my friend from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. I want to ask the gentleman this question on account of his knowledge and extensive study of section 11. In the gentleman's opinion, does section 11 of the House bill give the Commission authority in its discretion to do the same thing which section 11 of the Senate bill would require the Commission to do in regard to the virtual elimination or liquidation of holding companies?

Mr. PETTENGILL. No; it does not—not to the same extent.

Mr. MOTT. Now, may I ask the gentleman this question: If the Commission carries out its authority to require a holding company to divest itself of whatever properties and securities may be necessary to confine its operations to a single region or area, will not that also impair the value of the securities of the holding company held by the general public?

Mr. PETTENGILL. There is no question about that, I will say to my friend from Oregon. The situation is the same as a farmer who owns two or three farms in two or three counties and he knows that 5 years from now he has got to sell two of these farms and he does not know which ones he will be told to sell. Do you suppose that the owner of one of those farms is going to put any money into those properties in the next 3 or 5 years, not knowing whether he is going to be able to own them in the future or not? [Applause.]

I attach as a part of my remarks the separate report to which I have referred.

[H. Rept. 1318, pt. 2, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

PUBLIC UTILITY ACT OF 1935

Mr. PETTENGILL, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following additional views (to accompany S. 2796):

In some respects this bill does not go as far as I would wish. I have favored the use of a small tax, the effect of which would be a constant pressure toward the gradual simplification of the holding-company superstructure. This has been voted against by the committee. The President, however, in his recent tax message expressed his approval of the principle for which I have contended and I trust the Ways and Means Committee will now study the matter carefully with a view to its general adoption.

During the Wilson administration there was such a tax on intercorporate dividends. After the World War it was repealed. It is my judgment that such repeal made it easy to and therefore encouraged the development of one holding company on top of another.

I believe that such a tax, together with the elimination of stamp and other taxes which now operate as a penalty on reorganization and simplification, would in a few years accomplish the objectives the President has in mind and yet do so without drastic liquidation, without unnecessary harm to innocent investors, and without creating a situation of doubt and uncertainty under which business and reemployment of our idle men cannot go forward.

The holding company in the first degree in many instances performs a useful function and under divers State law, in some cases is a legal necessity. This is attested to by no less an authority than David E. Lilienthal, now a member of the Board of the Tennessee Valley Authority. In an article in the Columbia Law Review in 1929 he wrote—

"Since the pioneer public-utility acts of New York and Wisconsin were enacted 2 decades ago a new figure, the holding and management company, has come upon the field, demonstrated its prowess, and in a relatively few years changed the entire economic nature of the public-utility industry. Isolated plants have given way to great systems whose lines span several States and serve hundreds of communities, all operated under unified managerial and financial supervision. The spread of rural electrification, the amazing advances in telephony, the rise of superpower systems—these and many other technological developments so intimately related to the public welfare are directly attributable to the efforts of the holding company. Perhaps most important of all, to the holding company must go the credit for the unprecedented flow of capital into the public-utility industry making possible extensions and improvements of service. Every phase of public-utility operation—financing, accounting, engineering, management, public relations—have undergone great changes under the new regime."

The pyramiding of holding companies, however—in some instances as much as 10 stories—is a legal monstrosity, an economic dinosaur, and a social wrong. Nevertheless, both State and National Governments have permitted, even encouraged them. In the meantime, and on the faith of what their own governments have created, thousands of innocent people have invested the savings of a lifetime. Government itself is partly at fault in the matter and because this is so the remedy for the evils which have grown up should take the equities of investors into consideration.

These evils, in my judgment, are on their way out and drastic remedies are neither necessary nor just. To begin with many of these financial structures have fallen of their own weight—such as Insull, Foshay, and Clark. In addition the following forces have entered the field since 1929, and are now at work. They are:

1. The recent elimination of consolidated tax returns which also encouraged the development of corporate superstructure and for which the Federal Government, like the repeal of the intercorporate dividend tax, must accept its share of the responsibility for the situation which we now seek to cure.
2. The Federal Securities Act of 1933, as amended.
3. The Federal Stock Exchange Act of 1934.
4. The Federal Power Commission Act.
5. Closer regulation of utility securities and operations by various State commissions, some 32 in number.
6. As a pertinent example we now have statutes in many States which require the filing of all management, construction and engineering, and other contracts made with an affiliate, and providing that no such contract shall be effective unless so filed. The Commission, after a hearing, may hold the contract in whole or in part as against the public interest. Statutes of this character are now in force in New York, Kansas, Virginia, North Carolina, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Illinois, Indiana, Oregon, Maine, and Wisconsin.
7. Last but not least, even in the absence of State statutes, we have the powerful effect of recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court such as Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co. (282 U. S. 133), and Dayton Power & Light Co. v. Public Utility Commission (292 U. S. 297), holding that State Commissions may inquire into and disallow excessive charges made for services, etc., by holding companies to their subsidiaries.

The focusing of these forces, and others which might be mentioned, have changed the picture very greatly over that of 10 years ago and in my judgment will operate not only to prevent future abuses but also tend to weed out the rank growths and unfair practices which grew up in the past.

This brings us to the "death sentence" as it appeared in the original bill and as now appears in the Senate bill (S. 2796, sec. 11). It may be pointed out that this was not advocated:

1. By the Federal Trade Commission in its utility company report;
2. By the Federal Power Commission;
3. By the Securities Exchange Commission;
4. By the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce;
5. By any group of consumers;
6. By any group of investors;
7. By the State public utility commissions; or
8. By the party platforms of the Democratic or Republican Parties.

In the hearings none of the Government witnesses gave the "death sentence" a clear-cut endorsement.

The "death sentence" as it now appears in the Senate bill, in my judgment, will crack like an eggshell in the United States Supreme Court for reasons which I have stated at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Thursday, June 20, page 9787. If this is so, why pass it?

The substitute provision in the House bill may also not withstand legal attack. It is difficult for me to find constitutional power in Congress to require a solvent State corporation to dispose of property rights in operating utilities merely because they may not all be within an integrated system. I cannot believe that ownership, even management, of separate utility properties constitutes such a direct effect on interstate commerce as to come within congressional power as recently defined by the Supreme Court.

Nevertheless the House substitute is infinitely better than the Senate bill from a constitutional standpoint, and if legal, holding companies have their day in court to justify their continued existence and ownership of properties upon the merits of the particular case.

I believe the bill should be amended to further guarantee the States and State utility commissions from unnecessary and duplicating Federal control and interference. Despite the expansion of economic areas which transcend State lines, I still believe the cause of good government is served by following the historic principles of Thomas Jefferson except where deviation or modification is imperatively necessary. Jefferson is right in all cases except where Hamilton is inevitable.

In closing I wish to express my appreciation to Chairman RAYBURN and my colleagues on the committee and subcommittee for his and their constant courtesies and fairness during the painstaking consideration which we have given to this bill. Whenever we have differed we have done so as friends.

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this subject is so large one scarcely knows where to start in a discussion of it, and if one were not limited by the time assigned, it might be impossible to find any terminal facilities at all.

I am going to deviate a little bit from the topic of discussion thus far held and say something about the electrical utility industry as a whole and its present position in this country, but before doing so I want to supplement, in my feeble way, the discussion indulged in by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] with respect to the proposal for the forced dissolution of a holding company. It is true, as has been stated to you, that more than one member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce inquired of the proponents of that particular provision if they would submit to us a typical break-down of a holding company going through dissolution. Unfortunately, none of them ever returned to us with any outlined suggestions, but one of the companies, anticipating, perhaps, that such a question would be asked, did insert into our record a graphic table showing what would happen to its stockholders in relation to their rights in the stocks or securities of its subsidiaries. The company that offered this table was the United Gas Improvement Co. of Pennsylvania, and I call your attention to it not to strengthen the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, for it needs no strengthening whatsoever; he has demonstrated beyond all doubt that utter chaos would prevail all through the electrical utility field.

Here we have the case of the company generally known in the field as "U. G. I." It has invested in subsidiary companies $209,000,000. It owns the shares of the subsidiary companies. Thus the shareholders of U. G. I. are the owners, indirect, of the subsidiary companies.

There are a number of subsidiary companies, each of whose shares is held by U. G. I. If U. G. I. is compelled to dissolve, then, unless U. G. I.'s stockholders can sell their stock on the open market, which, of course, they could not do under any such order of dissolution, the shareholders of U. G. I. will have to accept in satisfaction of their rights a proportionate number of shares of the subsidiary companies. In other words, one common share in U. G. I. would entitle its holder to a certain number of shares in each of the subsidiary companies. I hope I make this clear.

Now, let us see how this works out. It were ludicrous if it were not tragic. For example, each shareholder in U. G. I. would take for his share in that company twenty-six ten-thousandths of a share in the Allentown-Bethlehem Gas Co. Each shareholder in U. G. I. would take six hundred and three one-hundred-thousandths of a share in the American Gas Co. Each shareholder in U. G. I. would take twenty-five one-hundred-thousandths of a share in the Chester County Light & Power Co.

So the list goes on in equally absurd fractions. The largest fraction of a share in a subsidiary company that a U. G. I. shareholder would receive would be two-fifths of a share in the Philadelphia Electric Co.

The smallest fraction which a shareholder in U. G. I. would take for his share would be three one-millionths of a share in the New Haven Gas Light Co.

I shall not take your time in reading the rest of this table, but, taken as a whole, this table recites exactly what would happen, Mr. PETTENGILL, to the shareholders of U. G. I., innocent parties to this whole transaction.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. And if you divide the U. G. I. into those small fractions, what is going to happen to the value of all of that operating stock?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is gone.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I must decline to yield, as I have only a limited time. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it is possible for this table to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It seems to be of a size within the RECORD page. If it is possible, within the rules, I ask that the table be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know how other members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee look back on their experience during the 8 weeks of those hearings. I say without any hesitation whatsoever that it was the most informing experience I have ever encountered as a Member of Congress. At the start of the hearings I knew nothing whatsoever about holding companies and nothing whatsoever about the electrical industry. The proponents of this bill came before us and with great zeal proposed the drastic treatment which the Senate bill provides and which the original Wheeler-Rayburn bill provided. They made a deep impression by their zeal, if for no other reason, and they seemed to speak with considerable authority and knowledge of the facts. When they had finished their support of the bill at the hearings the companies themselves were then given opportunity to reply, and as those men came before us representing company after company, the thought dawned upon me, which finally became a conviction, and I know it dawned upon many of my fellow members of that committee in like fashion, that the proponents of the bill, perhaps without intention, had not told us the whole truth about the situation. Many and many a charge which has been leveled against the companies, giving the impression or seeking to give the impression that all companies were guilty of these abuses, proved not to be true, and as time went on in the hearings it became increasingly apparent that only a minority of the holding companies or the operating companies, if they were under any charge at all, were guilty of these abuses. Moreover, it became increasingly apparent that scarcely any of those abuses had occurred subsequent to the passage of the Securities Act of 1933 and the Stock Exchange Act of 1934. Most of the abuses with which the holding companies are charged have to do with what might be termed " high finance ", the issuance of securities in an improper manner and the deception of buyers.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], chairman of the committee, while he was speaking here yesterday, brought in and set up a great chart at a point on the floor approximately where I am standing now. It set forth the corporate set-up of one of the holding companies. His selection of that chart was skillful from his standpoint, because that is the company that is alleged to be the black sheep of the whole outfit, not with respect to the efficiency of its operating companies down at the bottom but with respect to the juggling and manipulation of its finances up at the top and down through some of its subsidiary holding companies.

Mr. KELLER. What is the name of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Associated Gas & Electric. That is the company which, according to my best information, is not a member of the Association of Companies, and I submit that it is not fair on the part of the chairman of the committee, or on the part of any proponents of this drastic legislation, to use that company as an example and give the impression that all of the companies are similarly tainted.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does not the gentleman think that he ought to yield at this point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. RAYBURN. The chairman of the committee hung that chart up there in order to show what could be done by an unregulated holding company, and there is nothing in the charter or the law of many of the others to keep them from doing the same thing. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am only human and subject to impressions, and I have the deep impression that from the very beginning of all this discussion an attempt has been made to show that all companies are guilty. [Applause.] I do know that over and over again the worst companies have been lifted up to the public gaze in order to prove that proposition, and it is against that that I protest.

As to the condition of the electrical industry, I think there are some facts that are very interesting. I hope not to deluge the committee with figures, but I think we ought to have a better conception of what is going on. If you go into the living costs of the average American family, that is, the cost of those articles which are the more important items in the family budget, you will find that the residential electric-light bill is the lowest of them all. The average residential electric-light bill in the homes of the United States is $2.75 per month.

Mr. RANKIN. For how much electricity?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the average of the residential light bills.

Mr. RANKIN. In New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The country over.

Mr. RANKIN. But that is for only a few kilowatt-hours.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The average of all homes, the residences, lumped in together, is $2.75 per month. Some pay a little less, and some pay more.

Mr. RANKIN. It averages less than 40 kilowatt-hours a month.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am speaking of the average of the bills.

Mr. KELLER rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot yield; I want to complete my statement.

It is interesting to note that since 1913 the cost of living in the United States up to 1934 has risen 39 percent. The cost of residential electricity has dropped 29 percent. So while it is costing the average family more to live today than in 1913, for food, clothing, rent, housing, and fuel by 39 percent, the average residential cost of electricity has gone down 29 percent. This electric-utility picture is not quite as dark as some people would give you to understand.

Now, if we want to come closer to the current period and look into the matter in the last 2 years, the figures from March 1933 to March 1935 show that in that period the cost of clothing in the United States has risen 25 percent; the cost of furniture has risen 33 percent. Perhaps N. R. A. has had something to do with this, but nevertheless these are the facts. The cost of food has increased 35 percent in the last 2 years, in the midst of this depression, whereas the cost of residential electricity has dropped 6 percent. Not quite so dark a picture, Mr. Chairman, of the electrical industry of the United States as managed and supervised by these "wicked" companies which are to be put out of business entirely if the Senate bill should pass; not quite so dark a picture!

Now, let us see what this industry does with respect to labor. If you start back in 1929, which was the peak year, the year when the boom was most fantastic, and set the figure of that year as 100 and say that $100 in the aggregate was spent for labor that year in the iron and steel industry, you will find that that $100 expenditure for labor has been reduced in 1934 to $46. In other metal mills the reduction is from $100 down to $49; in bituminous-coal mining it is down to $54; in the crude-petroleum industry it is down to $57; in the paper and printing industry it is down to $67; in the lumber industry it is down to $33.50. Those are drastic reductions in the number of dollars expended for labor in those typical industries.

What is the story in the electrical industry? Starting at $100 the electrical industry today has been reduced only to $85.20. It shows by far the best record with respect to the amount of money it has expended proportionately during this depression; better than steel, better than coal, better than lumber, better than oil.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is an absolute necessity, though, is it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Never mind. The industry has done it, necessity or not; and they should have some little credit for it.

Now, let us see about the number of people employed and the average wages. We can learn something about this. If you start again in 1929 and put the figure 100 as the standard of that year, as indicating the number of men employed, the iron and steel industry has been reduced to 68; other metals down to 70; bituminous coal down to 77; crude petroleum down to 78; other metal mining down to 41; paper and printing down to 86; the lumber industry down to 51; the electrical power industry down only to 91. In other words, the electric light and power industry is employing today 91 percent of the men it employed before the depression started. In that respect it is at the top of the whole heap. [Applause.] Is that an indictment against its management? If so, how do you proceed to draw such an indictment?

Now, as to the average wages, I cannot make comparisons for the other industries, but the average wage today in the electric light and power industry is $30 a week—$120 a month—double the minimum wage of N. R. A., and no code brought that about. That wage has not varied before or since N. R. A. appeared and disappeared from the scene.

Now, Mr. Chairman, something about the holding company and its functions.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. RAYBURN] had upon this side of the well yesterday a very, very large, and if I do say so, a very unwieldy chart, depicting the corporate structure or set-up of Electric Bond & Share. That corporate set-up has been used before our committee in various arguments as illustrative of the worst kind of sprawling corporate structure. The chairman of the committee used that same word, "sprawling." We have heard it before. I was not surprised to hear it again. Geographically considered, it is a sprawling structure, but nevertheless it affords an opportunity for me to take the worst kind of sprawling and describe the functions of an organization of that kind.

Electric Bond & Share was organized something like 20 years ago. I know nothing about its original incorporators or organizers. It is the small-town holding company. It owns or controls subordinate operating companies in 32 States, in 3,200 communities.

The story of how it started may not be lacking in interest. Years ago, long before the World War, the General Electric Co., a manufacturing concern, having sold generators and other electrical appliances to large numbers of small companies scattered all over the Union, found that a considerable number of those companies could not pay their accounts with General Electric. General Electric had taken notes in part payment, and had secured the unpaid accounts as best it could, but as the years went along General Electric, to its regret, found itself finally the owner of a considerable number of little bankrupt companies, operating companies scattered all over the Union. It did not want to go into the utility field. It was utterly against its policy. It wanted to remain purely a manufacturing concern.

So a group of people was organized—who they were I do not know—to take off the hands of the General Electric Co. these little bankrupt companies; and that concern was called Electric Bond & Share. Electric Bond & Share ever since that time has been in the business of taking care of small operating companies that have gone broke or have been in serious difficulty financially, with the result that they own or control companies in 32 States.

It is an interesting thing—and the testimony before our committee proves it—that in every instance that Electric Bond & Share has picked up a little bankrupt company the rates charged by that company to the consumers have gone down. Incidentally Electric Bond & Share, or its intermediate holding company, has put the little operating company on its feet financially; it has enabled it to extend its service. As indicating how the service is extended through the help of proper financing by the holding company, let me say that these little companies acquired from time to time by Electric Bond & Share have reached 1,830 additional communities in the last 10 years; and those communities in population averaged from 100 to 800—little country hamlets, a perfect example of rural electrification. I want to refer for just a moment to the testimony. I shall not deluge you with figures, but this indicates what can be done with this kind of management.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would rather not.

There were 1,833 new communities, none of which ever had any electric service, or if they did, had it only at nighttime and then not upon moonlight nights. Forty-seven percent of these communities had populations ranging from 100 to 500; 40 percent had populations under 100; and 10 percent had populations ranging between 500 and 1,000. Only two had a population of 3,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York was yielded 40 minutes. Upon the request of the gentleman from Ohio the Chair has called time at the end of 30 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, may I say to my colleague on the committee that I made a mistake in my assignment of time. I can give the gentleman 5 additional minutes. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In this sprawling system 89 percent of the communities served have populations of less than 3,000, 8 percent have populations ranging from 3,000 to 10,000, and the remaining very small percentage have populations of 10,000 or more.

This sprawling system is the small-town system of the United States; it is not an integrated system. Under the House bill, may I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, it could be dissolved over night in the discretion of the Commission, because these little communities scattered in 32 States cannot be considered as belonging to an integrated system. Still, if you tear that great organization to pieces and endeavor to redistribute the stock of the 143,000 stockholders of Electric Bond & Share amongst the shareholders of the tiny little operating companies in 3,200 little bits of towns all over the United States, what good have you done to anybody?

Something has been said as to the cost of service performed by the holding company. I am using this company as an example because it was paraded before us as one of the worst. The testimony before our committee shows that Electric Bond & Share Co., in providing engineering service, legal advice, service in the purchase of supplies, and kindred subjects, charges a fee against the operating company amounting to one-fortieth of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour delivered by the operating company. In other words, if the fee were withdrawn the rate to the consumer would be reduced only one-fortieth of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour; and based upon the gross receipts of all these little operating companies who have been put upon their feet, whose rates have been reduced, all the fees charged by Electric Bond & Share would amount to just 1 percent. Is this milking anybody? Could these little companies go out and get this service so cheaply anywhere else? Why, you know they could not; they would not have a chance.

If you smash this organization to pieces, what do you do? The chief injury is to the little operating company, not to the president of Electric Bond & Share, not to its directors, but the injury would be done the little company. How could it ever finance an extension? How could a little company in a town of 1,000 borrow money at any favorable rate to finance an extension out into the country for 10, 15, or 20 miles? You know it could not do it. It is the holding company performing its proper, honest function which, pooling the assets of 3,200 little bits of jerk-water companies, makes it possible for all of them to be kept expanding, their rates to be constantly reduced, and all of them kept on their feet. Tear it to pieces, and you injure the consumers. The Senate bill would tear Electric Bond & Share to smithereens; and even the House bill, if the Commission were made up of persons with a deep and persistent prejudice against holding companies not integrated—even the House bill permits the Commission to tear that organization to pieces. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman from New York says about the Electric Bond & Share—and I name that company because he did—permit me to point out that this company over and above all expenses on their services to operating companies made in 1 year $4,969,449.40, or a profit above the expense of performing that service of 113 percent.

I say that there are but two classes of people entitled to this amount of almost $5,000,000. Either it should have gone in dividends to stockholders in the operating companies or in reduced rates to the consumers, but not to Electric Bond & Share.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] in his vicious attack on President Roosevelt and the Democratic administration, went out of his way to make an attack on the Tennessee Valley Authority, and went to a length that I never expected to see reached by a Member of this House. The insinuation was that the people in the town of Norris were denied the right to worship God as they pleased. Behind that was the insinuation that the Power Trust has continuously hurled, namely, that the Tennessee Valley Authority is communistic.

Let us consider his words:

> Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It was brought out in our committee, and I dislike very much to bring this up, when Mr. David Lilienthal, one of the directors of T. V. A., was questioned, that down there where they are building the town of Norris, and they have from 2,000 to 2,500 people employed, they will not allow a church in that community.

Mr. COOPER said that in his own time. He was interrupted. After the interruption he stated:

> When the direct question was put to Mr. Lilienthal if they would permit a church down there, he said no, absolutely not.

Let us read the record. Let us see what the record shows. On page 2045, part 3, of the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] asked this question:

> What about this charge that no man may worship in a church or build a church to worship in in accordance with his own conscience?
> Mr. LILIENTHAL. That is poppycock. From the first there has been a community hall available for use of any group or denomination who desires to worship there. Recently with the completion of a school building, a dignified and appropriate auditorium has been made available. Religious activities are carried on there by the people themselves regularly.

Why this insinuation and against the directors of the T. V. A.? Who is Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority? Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, of Ohio, and, I repeat, that he is one of the great men not only of this country but of this time and generation. Go to the people in the State of Ohio and to those communities on the Miami River where 20 years ago men, women, and children were being drowned by the thousands.

When the State of Ohio sent out a plea for somebody to come and solve the great question of controlling that stream and protecting the people up there, why did they not send for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who hurls this insinuation against Dr. Morgan and the T. V. A.? They sent for Dr. Morgan, who at that time constructed dams on the Miami River and protected those people ever after from those disastrous floods. I could not let this opportunity go by without answering that charge which has been made by the power interests ever since this fight began. The directors of the T. V. A. are men of character. They are rendering great services, and I resent such an insinuation.

Only on yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] made a vicious attack on Mr. Basil Manly, of the Federal Power Commission. Mr. Manly wrote Mr. WILSON a letter today, and to that letter there is attached copy of a letter from the Honorable William Howard Taft, former President of the United States, and former Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, who was associated with Mr. Manly during the World War.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that those two letters may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

JUNE 28, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM HENRY WILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: My attention has just been directed to your remarks in the House on June 27, 1935, in which you are quoted as follows with reference to my alleged connections:

"Basil M. Manly, Socialist; member of the Garland Fund Committee; contributing editor to the Intercollegiate Socialist Society Organ; and was member of the defense committee of the Industrial Workers of the World—I. W. W.—which organization was composed of Socialists and anarchists, the underlying principle of which was the organization of industrial workers into unions to war against employers by any and all means, to overthrow the Government and establish government by unions."

This statement, which is evidently based upon information handed you by someone and not upon your own personal investigation, is remarkable in that it does not contain one correct statement.

I am not a Socialist and have never been affiliated with the Socialist Party in any way, shape, or form.

I was never a member of the Garland Fund Committee.

I was never a contributing editor or a contributor to the "Intercollegiate Socialist Society Organ", whatever that may be.

I was never a member of the defense committee of the Industrial Workers of the World, nor did I ever at any time have any connection with that organization of any kind whatever. On the contrary, I was of material assistance on more than one occasion in assisting the regular organizations of the American Federation of Labor in resisting the attempts of the I. W. W. to gain control of bona fide labor organizations.

In view of the fact that you are a Republican and a member of the bar, perhaps the best evidence that you have been misled is to be found in a letter which former President and Chief Justice William Howard Taft wrote me at the conclusion of our association as Joint Chairmen of the National War Labor Board. I am therefore enclosing a copy.

May I suggest that you make such inquiries as you may consider advisable to establish the fact, and in due course make the corrections to which I believe that I am clearly entitled?

Very truly yours,

———— ————.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., August 15, 1919.

BASIL M. MANLY, Esq.

DEAR MANLY: As the War Labor Board breaks up, I wish to write you and say how much I appreciate the spirit of fairness and cooperation with which you have discharged your share of the joint duty imposed on us as chairmen. It is pleasant to be able to say that in the many controversies referred to us two, either as a section or as sole arbitrators, we have always reached an agreement except in the case of a rehearing in respect to which we really agreed to disagree.

You and I doubtless differ on many economic issues, but it is a great satisfaction to me—as I hope it is to you—to know that when we met in a quasi-judicial capacity, as man to man, we found each other reasonable, fair, and square in dealing with our fellow men whose cases we had to consider and decide.

I wish for you every success in your future career. It will always be a pleasure to me when our paths cross and to recall the interesting experiences we have had.

With warm personal regard, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) WM. H. TAFT.

Mr. RANKIN. That is a complete answer to the slanderous charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Now, let us get down to the Power Trust, this great sprawling octopus, which the gentleman from New York has referred to so often, that now reaches into every State in the Union, and whose tentacles reach into every home. Where do they get their money to operate? Remember that the man you are going to have to answer when you go home is the man who pays the light and power bill. Every cent, every dime, every dollar that goes to maintain this gigantic Power Trust, this overcapitalized trust, these pyramided corporations, if you please, must come from the man who pays the electric light and power bill. Into your home, into the homes of your neighbor, the home of every laboring man, every merchant, and even the man who runs a filling station, it reaches and exacts a toll.

Mr. Chairman, probably it is in order at this time for me to refer briefly to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], who so attacked the Democratic administration, as well as the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], because, forsooth, the gentleman from Texas, after months of struggle with all these Power Trust lobbyists that have been down here in Washington for the last 5 months with all the propaganda that could be poured in here, and all of the other influence that they could bring to bear, has been forced to bring in from his committee a bill to this House, this monstrosity that we hope to amend before we get through. Yet the gentleman from Alabama attacks the gentleman from Texas, Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, because now he will not agree to defend and support this monstrosity against all comers.

I say this Congress and the American people owe the gentleman from Texas a debt of gratitude for the labor he has spent in this matter and for his courage in coming out here and saying, "I am going to help amend this bill and make it what it should be before it leaves this House."

The gentleman from Alabama also in a round-about way attacks the administration. I have before me a speech he made on this very subject in which he pointed out the iniquities to which I have referred.

Now, let us see about this holding company proposition, and then I am going to get down to the rates. The gentleman from Alabama lives in Birmingham. The Alabama Power Co. supplies light and power for Birmingham. It is owned by the Commonwealth & Southern, a holding company, or I possibly should say a bleeding company, just as it owns the Mississippi Power Co., and it is sapping the economic vitality of all of them.

In 1929 the Commonwealth & Southern was organized. At that time we thought we were prosperous. They paid the president of that company $43,790 a year. The panic broke that same year, almost by the time they got it organized. Everything else went down. Cotton dropped to 5 cents a pound and wheat to 30 cents a bushel. Factories closed down. Men, women, and children were tramping the streets and begging for the bread of life. Soup kitchens were established all over the city and bread lines stretched down the streets of Birmingham from one end to the other, a thing I never heard of in that city before, although I live within 125 miles of it. At that time the salary of the president of the Commonwealth & Southern had risen from $43,700 in 1929 to $130,000 in 1932, at a time, as I said to you, when we were in the very depths of the depression.

Let us see about the stocks, and I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who has just spoken, will pay attention to this, because you need not deceive yourselves, this is the campaign issue from now on—the power fight in America. [Applause.] We are going to do one of two things. We are going to wring this octopus loose from the consumers of electric light and power, or you Republicans will take over the country and turn the country over to them.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I cannot yield right now; I am sorry.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I thought maybe you were speaking for the President on that.

Mr. RANKIN. I come as near as any man in the House here speaking for the President on this question.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. On the next campaign issue?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; it is the campaign issue from now on, and I think I am justified in saying that is the President's view. It is the issue from now until we protect the American people from this thieving that has been going on.

But let us see about these stocks that my friend, Mr. HUDDLESTON, shed all those tears about. Let us see what those stockholders suffered. You gentlemen on the Republican side, because your States are worse than Alabama, and if you will just give me time I will go through every one of them.

In 1930 the preferred stock in the Commonwealth-Southern was selling for 104, but by the time the president's salary reached $130,000, in 1932, this stock had dropped from 104 down to 27⅜. In 1929 the common stock was selling for 32, but in 1932, when the president's salary had risen to $130,000, this stock had dropped from 32 down to 1⅝; and the stock in the operating companies, the Alabama Power Co. and the Mississippi Power Co., is today scarcely worth the paper it is written on; yet they come in here and appeal to you to sanctify this enormous racket, this power racket, this holding-company racket, and give it the sanction of law, and slap the President of the United States in the face under the pretense that you are helping these stockholders. If you know a God's thing on earth about these operating companies, you know that they will be better off when you abolish these holding companies. [Applause.]

They say, "Let us regulate them." Oh, where have I heard that word? During all the time that Insull was plundering the people of Illinois and the rest of the country, I never heard the words "regulate Insull" come from that side of the House.

Take this home with you: There is going to be a collapse in the near future, whether you pass this bill or not, that is going to equal, if it does not surpass, the Insull collapse. Remember I told you that in these few remarks.

Regulate! How are you going to regulate these gigantic companies that reach from coast to coast? One Senator said the other day—and I agree with him thoroughly—you might as well attempt to regulate the moon. Straddling from California to New York and from Florida to Maine, bleeding all kinds of little companies in between—how are you going to regulate them? Down in my State they have become so strong with their lobby that they will not let us pass a law to even regulate rates. They have kept the legislature from giving our railroad commission any jurisdiction whatever. I appealed to the Federal Government, and there was no power of regulation there. The only power we could find was in the municipalities.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. The Board attempted to regulate them and were enjoined in the Federal courts.

Let me give you some figures on their overcharges. I am going to the State of New York. I am not taking the T. V. A. figures, either, because they are too high. I hope they will be lowered later; but in the State of New York the people of that State are overcharged for electric lights and power to the amount of $127,618,000 a year. For what? That much more than they should be charged to maintain operating expenses—and for what? To support that great octopus, that great power far-reaching ramification of economic cancer, that is literally sapping the lifeblood from the American people.

Take the State of Ohio, represented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. They are overcharged $47,529,000 a year. Every man who turns on an electric light, every laboring man, everyone that comes home at night and switches on the light to see how to change his clothes, is paying tribute to this gigantic monster that these gentlemen are trying to protect on this floor. Every man who runs a filling station or store, everyone who runs any kind of a little establishment is paying his tribute to keep this gigantic monster going, and to pay these enormous salaries. That is not all. I am going to put in every State in the Union at this point. I have a right to extend my remarks. I call the attention of my friend from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] to the condition in the State of Indiana. Of course, the people of Indiana may be more able to pay this than I think they are, but they are overcharged $19,189,000 a year. I wonder if the people of Indiana are able to pay such an overcharge every year.

The people of the State of Nevada are overcharged $1,046,000 every year.

The people of the State of Washington are overcharged $11,661,000 every year.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] says there have been rate reductions since 1933. Those reductions were made after we passed the T. V. A. bill and the T. V. A. yardstick was adopted, showing what electricity is worth. At that time in Birmingham, after the depression had gone on for 5 years, they were charging those people more than three times as much on an average for light and power as they were charging in Tacoma, Wash.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I am sorry, but I cannot yield.

Mr. MOTT. I just wanted to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi declines to yield.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? I hoped the gentleman would spend just a moment or two talking about rates in States which have proper regulation.

Mr. RANKIN. I have put the Oregon overcharges in already. It amounts to $6,510,000 a year.

This is a gigantic struggle. You may attack the President of the United States if you want to, you may undermine him. These Democrats may betray him and join you Republicans in your support of the Power Trust against this administration, but I for one am going to continue the fight.

Long after we pass from the stage of action here the American people will raise up their voices in gratitude to Franklin D. Roosevelt for having the courage, the manhood, and the common honesty to battle with this great problem and try to protect the American people from the greatest menace of this day and generation. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself some time. I knew when I took the floor yesterday and criticized the T. V. A. that I was going to get under the skin of my friend JOHN RANKIN, from Mississippi. Every time that anyone on this floor attempts to criticize the T. V. A. he starts his gymnastics and dances around here as if the T. V. A. was a sacred thing that nobody could touch or speak about. I cannot let the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] which he made a few moments ago go unchallenged. When Mr. Lilienthal was before our committee and the question asked him if they allowed a church in the town of Norris, Tenn., where they had 2,500 people working, he said "no." He was asked why, and he said because it is a Government reservation and they do not allow churches on a Government reservation. Later on—and I read from the record—the following occurred:

Mr. WOLVERTON. You are building a permanent town there, are you not? Is it not to be an ideal town, according to your press releases?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Well, when the town ceases to be a construction camp and becomes a municipality, then the people themselves will decide again what kind of churches they want.

Mr. WOLVERTON. You are building today permanent homes there, are you not?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Yes, sir; they are built.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Whether they are occupied or not now, you expect that they will be occupied?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Is not that true?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLVERTON. You are building for the future, are you not?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It will be a permanent town?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Under those circumstances, if a religious organization, regardless of what its creed may be, wishes to come in there now and build a permanent church, alongside of the permanent gasoline station, or a permanent home, that you have built there, would you give it the privilege of doing so?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. No one has ever asked for it, and it is incredible that they would. What we would do if such a situation arose I cannot say.

Mr. WOLVERTON. What do you mean that it is incredible? What would you do if they made an application? Is there any doubt in your mind as to whether you would grant it?

Mr. LILIENTHAL. Yes, sir; there is.

Then a little later on, when the question was asked him if they would allow a church there, he said "absolutely no." But I will tell you why this is not in the record. Mr. WOLVERTON called him to task before our committee. He deliberately changed the record as it was given in the committee, and he apologized to Mr. WOLVERTON later on in the committee for doing so. It is a known fact to the members of the committee that Mr. Lilienthal, in reply to a question, stated that they would not allow a church to be constructed in the town of Norris, Tenn.

That is all I have to say. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 4 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

Mr. DARROW. I am very pleased, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], in his remarks, referred to the United Gas Improvement Co. of Philadelphia as a typical illustration of what the "death sentence" in the Wheeler-Rayburn bill would mean to our holding-company utilities. Mr. Chairman, we in Philadelphia know of the efficient and businesslike methods of this great corporation. It has, without request, on numerous occasions, reduced its rates. When we think that corporations of this kind will receive their death knell in this bill, such a thing seems unthinkable, at least to me. What will happen to the many, many thousands of investors who have put their life savings in what were supposed to be gilt-edge securities?

It is my desire to register a vigorous protest against the adoption of legislation as proposed in the utilities holding-company bill, commonly known as the "Wheeler-Rayburn bill", which is now before the House for action. In so doing I am not only expressing my views, after a careful study of the problem, but also voicing the earnest and vigorous protest of my constituency, which is aroused to an extent I have never heretofore witnessed concerning any subject before Congress for action.

It is my contention that this proposed legislation is the first step toward Government control or ownership of public utilities; and if the President succeeds in his efforts and the Democratic-controlled Congress eventually abides by his expressed wishes there will be no question as to the destruction of holding companies.

Usually, when it has been considered necessary or advisable for Congress to initiate a new legislative policy in respect to some major national problem, there has been a demand from the people of the country in such loud tone that it had to be recognized. I have heard no such demand from our section of the country—in which many large and responsible utility and holding companies operate. Even since this proposed legislation has been pending I have not had a half dozen requests to support it; but, on the contrary, have had many thousands of letters of protest.

Surely whatever hope a great mass of our people placed in new-deal policies as a means of recovery from an existing depression has, I believe, been destroyed by the sponsorship of this pernicious legislation by the new-deal Democratic administration. You will find voters by the thousands who in 1932 supported Democratic candidates on a basis that a change in party control of the National Government could not result in worse conditions will admit their error of judgment and give their future support to the Republican Party, realizing that its representatives have always legislated for the benefit of the public and that they have stood by their enunciated principles of safe and sound form of government.

Certainly all of us would willingly approve necessary and proper regulation—for no investor, large or small, and no public-spirited citizen would approve the conduct of any business excepting in a law-abiding and upright manner. If an honest attempt was to be made for such regulatory legislation, I believe it would meet little, if any, real opposition. While it may be said that this is what the House is trying to do, the great fear is clearly evident that in the end the President will have sufficient power to force Congress to meet his decided wishes, which, of course, means absolute destruction of holding companies.

Numerous appropriate phrases have been used to describe this campaign of ruin, such as, "It would burn down the barn to roast the pig", "Kill the patient to cure the disease", "Sinking the ship to stop leaks", and so forth. If a horse is bad, one trains him or has him trained, and does not have the animal killed. If some public-utility holding companies have been bad, why kill all of them?

Public-utility organizations are practically public institutions. The gas and electric service which they have developed in the past 50 years has brought us out of the kerosene and candlelight age at such a reasonable cost to permit its use in practically every American home. The holding companies have been the means of enabling the development of utilities by furnishing capital and credit and managerial skill. The new deal has recognized the worth of holding companies, for the T. V. A. Authority, created by the present administration, is a holding company incorporated in the State of Delaware.

Capital for the successful operation and conduct of our utility and holding companies has been secured by investments readily made by thousands upon thousands of our thrifty citizens, who had every reason to believe this was an appropriate and safe place in which to invest their hard-earned savings for their future protection. The same confidence was placed in these organizations by great numbers of insurance companies, savings banks, and other institutions, as well as executors of estates.

The question naturally arises: What will happen to these thrifty people, small investors, widows, elderly folk, and institutions by the destruction of holding companies? Chaos and ruin to a great number of our people will be a natural result. Ten millions of stockholders, the majority of whom own from 5 to 50 shares of stock—most of which is common stock—will have their savings destroyed, and in many cases the sole source of income of needy individuals will be taken from them.

In the forced liquidation of these corporations bonded indebtedness and preferred stocks have prior claim on the assets. Since the assets of these corporations must be disposed of on a declining and overburdened market, it is most probable nothing will be left for the common-stock holders, who would thus suffer a total loss.

Most of our utility and holding companies have proved to be well managed, and this has been evident to our great mass of investors. They have been working for the benefit of the public, and are willing to abide by reasonable regulation to further establish their responsibility.

I plead for a sane and sound consideration of this subject. If there is sufficient reason to believe that practices of some of these corporations need correction for the protection of the public, let us fairly and in a temperate manner seek to correct any such evils by proper regulation or supervision. Let us consider this problem judiciously and not be swayed by radical or socialistic tendencies. Too much is at stake to ruthlessly destroy institutions and organizations in which so many millions of our people, of all classes, have expressed their confidence.

In my opinion the passage of this bill will do more to retard recovery, and destroy public confidence, than any proposal heretofore pending in Congress. I therefore urge you, my colleagues, to vote against the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, among the verbal brickbats that have been flying in the House over title I, parts 2 and 3 of this bill relating to operating companies are comparatively innocent bystanders. It has been my judgment that the hearings on this bill, as well as the argument, have been lop-sided. Attention has been centralized on some features of the bill far beyond their relative importance, and other features of perhaps equal importance neglected.

If I can be helpful to the House this afternoon, it is to discuss with you the features of this bill as to operating companies. I will attempt to give an outline of some of the main provisions covering those companies.

Much feeling and personalities have developed. The Congress is confronted with serious problems. Personalities and bitterness can contribute nothing to the solution of these problems.

We have this background as to the field of regulation now proposed by the Federal Government.

Companies producing over 90 percent of the electrical energy in the United States transmit energy in interstate lines. Over 17 percent of that electrical energy passes over State lines. A little over 82 percent is entirely intrastate. The energy now going across State lines is greater than the total production of energy 20 years ago. The volume of interstate transmission is constantly growing and will increase indefinitely in time and amount.

Here it is proposed that the Federal Government shall step in to regulate that interstate transmission of electrical energy. It is into that unregulated field, where the States have little or no control, that this bill, as far as operating concerns are affected, places the Federal Government in control.

These operating companies are the base of the whole utility industry of the United States. They are the producers and service operators. They represent an investment of $12,000,000,000. We go into this plan of regulation for the purpose of protecting the people of our country, and those people may be divided into two classes, the consumers of electrical energy and the holders of investments in these regulated companies. Needless to say, in a plan of this kind a desire to punish has no place. Just treatment to the consumers and to the investors is the necessary and only justification.

The Federal Government has no business to put its hands in this matter except to do a helpful and constructive thing. There is no other legitimate motive for going into this sort of thing. I stand here to support the provisions of parts 2 and 3 of this bill, believing that what is proposed to be done in those two parts will be helpful and constructive.

The bill, as you have observed, is divided into two titles. Title I is the holding company part. Title II includes amendments to the Water Power Act, and parts 2 and 3 refer to the public utilities and to those holding licenses under the Federal Power Commission.

SCOPE OF BILL

Beginning with part II, page 253, which refers to operating companies, the first two sections, in effect, define the general scope of the bill as to these matters. It is declared that the Federal Government is to have jurisdiction over the regulation of transmission of electricity in interstate commerce, and sales at wholesale in interstate commerce. Then it is further declared that this jurisdiction is to extend only to matters not subject to State regulation.

If you will pay attention to the provisions of this bill, you will find the greatest regard is shown throughout for the powers now exercised by the States.

Part II applies to the transmission in interstate commerce and for the sale at wholesale. "Wholesale" is declared to be a sale for the purpose of resale. That term does not apply to the transmitter who transmits his own "juice" for his own use.

Part 2 does not apply to any other kind of sales. All facilities so used for transmission and sale are within the jurisdiction of the bill. Certain exceptions are made. One exception is that control shall not apply to facilities used for generation. That presents one of the problems of this bill as contrasted with the Senate bill. The House committee, after careful consideration, reached the conclusion that we should not include in this bill the facilities used for the generation of electric energy, for two reasons. The first is that such a provision would be of doubtful constitutionality. The Federal Government may not have the power to exercise regulation over the generating facilities of these plants, even though they produce energy to be transmitted over State lines.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I am sorry; I cannot yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Before he leaves the subject, will not the gentleman discuss paragraph 13 (b) of section 204, the power of the Federal Government to regulate some 10,000 independent companies?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes; I hope to reach that.

The Utah case, which was a tax case, laid down the principle that the generation of electric energy is manufacturing and that interstate transmission does not begin until the electricity has entered into the transmission lines. That decision, however, may not be controlling as to this question. We did not think it desirable to inject the doubt into this bill.

There is another reason, however, going to the merits of this proposition as to why the House committee concluded to leave out generation. That reason is that over 82 percent of the electric energy manufactured in the United States is consumed within the States of production. Therefore we felt that control over generating facilities better be left to the States with certain exceptions, to which I shall later call attention.

Local distribution, even though it is over State lines, is not included in the bill; and, of course, transmission that is purely intrastate in character is not included, nor is transmission for the purpose of use by the transmitter.

States and public agencies, that is, agencies of the United States and of the States, are exempted from the terms of this bill unless specifically included. There are specific inclusions of the agencies of the United States and of the States for certain accounting purposes, for depreciation accounts in particular, and for the general powers of investigation, which are given to the Commission.

REGIONAL DISTRICTS

Provision is made for the division of the country into regional districts by the Commission, but after these districts are created the question of intercommunication and coordination within the district or of one district with another is left entirely to voluntary agreements between the utilities. There is a provision, however, that under certain conditions a physical connection can be compelled between one utility and another, but this can be accomplished only under certain strict limitations. One is that the application must be made either by a State commission or a utility, either an interstate or intrastate utility.

After hearing the Commission is authorize to require the connection, but subject to limitations, one of which is that the Commission shall not require the connection if it necessitates the enlargement of the generating facilities of the public utility. The other limitation is that it shall not be required if it would impair the service to the customers of the public utility which is thus required to make a connection.

Permission is given for emergency connections, without subjecting the companies to interstate regulation. With the consent of the Commission, permanent connections may be made with a public utility for emergency purposes without subjecting the utility to the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission.

The bill includes provision in reference to the disposition of property and the consolidation of public utilities. The public utility is required to get consent of the Commission if it disposes of facilities exceeding $100,000 in value. In case of consolidation with any other utility it must secure the consent of the Commission.

SECURITIES

An important feature of this bill deals with the issuance of securities. The bill starts out with a declaration that no issue of securities is to be made without the approval of the Commission. An application must be made to the Commission for the issuance of securities, and will be granted if asked for a lawful purpose and one which is compatible with the public interest. No such application to the Federal Power Commission is necessary by a public utility organized and operating in a State under the laws of which security issues are regulated by a State commission. This does not accept approval by a State in which the company is organized, but does not operate, or in which it operates but is not organized. Thirty-two States of the Union exercise control over the issuance of securities by utility companies. There are 16 States which have no such requirements. The utility companies in these 16 States would be required to go to the Federal Power Commission for consent to issue their securities.

Then there is a further provision to the effect that if an application is made and approved by the Federal Power Commission it will not be necessary for the utility to make a separate application under the Securities Act of 1933. By filing a copy of the application and proof that was offered to the Federal Power Commission the Securities Exchange Act is complied with, and without any further application.

The committee was confronted with three alternatives as to the control of the issuance of securities. One was to require all applicants go directly under the Securities Act. The second was to require all applicants to come to the Federal Power Commission. The third, and the policy adopted by the committee, was to require application to the Federal Power Commission only in those cases in which the State commissions do not have that authority as above indicated. But in those cases in which the States do exercise that authority it is necessary also to qualify under the Securities Act before the security may issue.

It is provided that in determining the cost of production and transmission the Commission shall act on its own motion or on the request of a State to provide information for the benefit of the State. At first reading this may seem like a strange section, but what it actually covers is the case where a public utility generates its power in one State and transmits it to another State for its own distribution. In this case the Federal Power Commission does not fix the rate of the delivery but does give to the State commission the information on which the State commission can fix its rates. This covers the inability of a State to go into another State and determine the value of a generation plant or the cost of such production.

Another section which has excited considerable controversy is 207, in reference to requiring adequate service in interstate transmission.

This section provides that on complaint of a State commission, and only on complaint of a State commission and after proper hearing, adequate service may be required; but, again, there are two limitations to this requirement. One is that the company shall not be required to enlarge its generating facilities in order to furnish adequate service over State lines. The other limitation is that the public utility shall not be required to furnish such service if to do so would impair the service to its customers.

RATES

This bill also involves the question as to the rate base that should apply in governing the rates for public utilities. The bill contains the general rule that rates must be just and reasonable. The committee would like to have been able to provide a better standard of valuation as a rate-making base, but after considering the question fully we determined it would be a futile thing to do. After the recent decision of the Supreme Court in a Maryland telephone case it is practically a futile thing, in my judgment, for any legislative body to try to write a rate-making base.

The Constitution has established a rate-making base that cannot be decreased or minimized; so when a legislative body attempts to write a rate-making base, we may add to the burden that may be placed upon the consumers of electricity, but we cannot subtract from their burden on account of anything that we may write in the way of a rate base. So without attempting to go any further, we have provided that rates shall be reasonable and just, and under the Supreme Court decision that means that the valuation must be based upon the current value of the property.

Cost is an element of the rate base, but only an element. The cost of reproduction might be an element, but only an element. The one question is the current value of the property, and the Supreme Court will permit no deviation from this principle.

In further reference to the deference that has been shown to the States in connection with the provisions of this bill, I call attention to the fact that provision is made for joint boards to conduct hearings where controversies exist over State lines. Every interested State may be represented on that board. The decision is advisory or as controlling as the Commission is authorized to provide by rules and regulations. In addition to that the Federal Power Commission itself may sit in joint hearing with a State commission to determine a controversy affecting any State in the country.

ACCOUNTS

When we come to part 3, which embodies the procedural provisions, we find that licensees under the Federal Power Commission are included. One of the first provisions is with reference to accounts. One of the most important features in this measure, as I view it, is that referring to accounts. The theory of this bill is to provide a unified accounting system for the public utilities of the United States. It would provide a common language for accounting methods and meanings. It would help to standardize accounting methods and give stability and certainty to utility values. The commission of every State is to be invited into conference on accounting matters before the rules are to be adopted.

A system of depreciation accounting is to be established for every public utility in the United States. Each public utility is to be given a right to a hearing as to the depreciation of its own property. The Federal Power Commission will not make one sweeping order which shall control the depreciation account of every utility in the country regardless of the substantial values that are affected. There will be no such thing as a uniform depreciation. For instance, out at Boulder Dam the high silt deposit means a shorter life to a turbine as compared to one situated in a clear stream up in New England. Therefore every company will be given the privilege of being heard in fixing its rate of depreciation. The important feature in connection with this section is that a depreciation rule is to be established by the Federal Power Commission that will be binding upon every other public utility subject to control under this bill.

The depreciation account has been one of the most common means for the concealment of profits, concealment of losses, and the concealment of illegitimate transactions. The uncontrolled depreciation account has been a common means of concealing or misrepresenting the true conditions of a company. A fight may be made in committee when this section is reached to try to destroy this feature of the bill. However, it is one of the most essential features if we want honest regulation.

The plan this bill proposes for accounting contemplates an accounting system that in every respect shall be faithful to the facts and one which shall prevent concealment and deception through the manipulation of accounts.

There is provision in this bill in reference to United States agencies, providing that the accounting and depreciation rules of this bill may be applied to the agencies of the United States and of the States. This applies to generation as well as to sales.

PUBLICLY OWNED AGENCIES

The Federal Power Commission is given the broadest authority to investigate and report upon every phase of the production, transmission, and sale of electric energy in the United States, not only affecting the utilities that are immediately under the control of the Federal Power Commission, but also agencies engaged in interstate commerce under the Federal Government, the States, municipalities, and other agencies of the States of the United States. We recognize the many municipally owned and federally owned production plants in the United States. This country doubtless for years to come will face a controversy, a competition between the privately and publicly owned utilities. It is the right of the municipalities of the United States to establish municipally owned plants if they want them. It is to the interest of the American people to have an accounting and reporting system that will give a just basis for comparison as between these two methods of production and sale of electricity.

So from the standpoint of the friends of public ownership as well as from the standpoint of the friends of private ownership this section guarantees authentic reports and investigations. This will afford a just basis of comparison of the two systems. In my opinion, that is a good feature of this bill. No one is going to be unjustly injured by a full revelation of the facts.

We have provisions here against interlocking directorates. This is a provision that to a degree will tend to break up the overwhelming organizations and the centralization of control that have been disclosed. There is a provision against dual directorships without approval of the Commission, or a banker acting as an officer or director, if he is a director or an officer of a bank that is engaged in underwriting or marketing public-utility securities.

With the approval of the Commission he may be permitted to retain his place upon the Board, but not otherwise. The same rule applies to an officer or director of an electrical equipment or supply company.

This is what may be called an open bill. Everywhere it provides for notice, for all interested parties to be represented, for hearings, the right to apply for rehearing, the right of appeal to the court, and so forth. A transcript of the testimony is furnished to the court. When a case goes to court, however, the presumption is in favor of the finding of the Commission.

If there is substantial evidence in support of the finding made by the Commission, then that finding controls the determination of the court.

Another provision that might be pertinent to the controversies of the last few months is that all rules and regulations made by the Commission shall be in convenient form and accessible to the public in the office of the secretary of the Commission.

The Commission is given broad power of investigation. Its general investigation section is similar to that of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has ample authority to investigate for the purpose of recommending legislation and for the purpose of conducting the business of the regulatory body. Information—correct and current information—is the foundation upon which a regulatory body must, of necessity, depend for the practical and successful administration of its affairs.

General penalties are provided in line with those already provided by the Congress in the Communications Act and in the Interstate Commerce Commission Act.

Without taking any more of your time, I may say I am in favor of these provisions in parts 2 and 3. I support them without any apology. I believe they would, if enacted into law, provide a helpful and a constructive service for the benefit of this country.

Referring to the operating companies, if this act is sensibly and sanely administered, it will be a benefit to the operating companies. The value of any regulatory body must largely depend upon the good sense, fairness, and loyalty to duty of its members. These provisions, if rightly and sanely administered, will give greater credence to what public utilities do; it will make their reports and their accounts reliable; it will add to the value of their stocks and their securities; such stocks and securities will be founded more certainly and more securely on real values and freer from the suspicion of manipulation, deception, and watered values. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee of this House which for the past 5 months has had to grapple with the so-called "public utility holding company bill", I rise now to register my opposition to the measure which the committee has reported and which is now before the House.

Though this bill has been rewritten by our committee, and though some of the particularly vicious features contained in the bill as originally presented to us, with a White House must-pass tag attached, have been substantially modified, it still remains a bad bill, a pediculous bill, and a bill which ought not to pass this House.

The redraft of the bill by our committee has added some sugar-coating to make it a little easier to swallow by such Members of the House as are constrained to swallow it.

The proponents of the bill make no concealment of their real intent—and their real intent is to go as far as possible in the annihilation of utility holding companies, and to go as far as possible in imposing Federal regulation upon the utility operating companies, to a further centralization of bureaucratic power in Washington, to a further obliteration of State power and authority, and to ultimate socialization of one of our major private industries.

The measure offers a striking example of the complexities and perplexities of legislation, under the new deal, which Congress is asked to enact.

The bill as presented to our committee, with Presidential endorsement and White House orders to railroad it through, comprised 178 pages of text, with many long and complex provisions, every one of which raises innumerable questions of public policy, of governmental authority, and of constitutional power.

To many members of the committee it has seemed that the more we studied the various provisions of the bill and the prospective consequences of it, if it were to be enacted, the worse it appeared.

Even the popular tag for this measure, "public utility holding company bill", is misleading and deceptive.

The outlawing of many holding companies, and regulation of what is left, is only one section of the bill. Title II of the measure rewrites the Federal Water Power Act and vests in the Federal Power Commission very large regulatory control over electric operating companies. This Federal regulation plan is but an entering wedge. The ultimate objective is to supplant the State utility commissions with Federal dictatorship.

The administration's position has been that the holding companies, with rare exception, were without justification, and served no good purpose; that regulation of the operating companies by State commissions has been a failure, and that the Federal Government would have to take over the business of electric rate making.

I see no valid reason or excuse for attempting to take out of the hands of the State utility commissions the regulation of utility operating companies and to transfer such regulation to Washington, except the greed and zeal of the present administration for power and authority over every kind of private business.

I see no valid reason or excuse for attempting by act of Congress to crucify the public-utility holding companies except to gratify the peculiarly vindictive hostility of the present administration to the utility industry.

No one would undertake to defend the Insulls nor some of the high finance which marked not only the public utilities but almost all other industries in the speculative orgy which preceded the stock-market crash in 1929.

On the other hand, to pillory the entire public-utilities industry as this bill does, and to undertake to wipe out a large part of the investment in that industry, is utterly ruthless and unwarranted reprisal.

As matters now stand, and if Congress gives the President his way in this matter, the entire utility industry is to be crucified, and the millions of investors are to be ravaged in retaliation for the misconduct and rascality of some utility operators and utility financiers, and under the specious claim that a benevolent Government is undertaking to safeguard its citizens from future exploitation.

Who are to be the victims if Congress consents to the bill and it becomes law? Not the gamblers and speculators who precipitated the stock-market debacle in 1929; not a few unscrupulous promoters and managers. The victims will be the investors in the industry. And who are they? They are millions of our fellow citizens—thrifty, honorable, and upright—whose slender savings have been invested in what has been supposed to be the safest possible investment, in an enterprise engaged in supplying an indispensable necessity of our present-day civilization, under municipal charter and State regulation.

In reality it is against these people that the administration is conducting its utility holding company warfare, all the ballyhoo to the contrary notwithstanding.

I am convinced that if honestly managed and properly supervised there is nothing inherently wrong or vicious in a holding company, and that in many situations a holding company has real justification. Whatever the individual opinion may be regarding the necessity for holding companies, it is perfectly evident that we cannot dissolve them without tremendous business upheaval and stupendous loss to the investors. The proponents of this bill are undertaking to unscramble an omelet.

Were it not for President Roosevelt's insistence and dictation I doubt if this bill could command a handful of votes in either House. This legislation is not related to business recovery. It is reform, and reform conceived in prejudice. It is comparable to a policy or killing all Christians because some of them are hypocrites. There is no substantial public demand for this bill.

On the contrary, there is opposition and protest from one end of the country to the other. It is charged that all of this protest is propaganda inspired by the Power Trust. I know personally many of the men and women in my district who have written to me in protest against this bill. I do not for 1 minute believe they are voicing any opinions but their own.

I am not going to take the time to read to the House any of these letters. Every Member of Congress, if he reads the letters from his own constituents, knows how many of them are opposed to the bill and fearful of its consequences.

I have here, however, a letter from the president of a public-utility company from which I wish to read a few paragraphs. The writer of this letter is not a constituent of mine. His company is nearly 2,000 miles from Massachusetts—it is on the tip end of Florida—the Tampa Electric Co. Some will say that since the writer of the letter is in the Power Trust his statements are unworthy of belief. Let his statement speak for itself. Let every Member here judge for himself the truth of this man's statements and the logic of his argument. The letter from which I am quoting was addressed to Chairman RAYBURN, and copies went to the members of our committee. It is signed by Peter O. Knight, president Tampa Electric Co. He writes:

I am amazed that anyone, Democrat or Republican, should seriously consider this sort of legislation in this country. I had always supposed that the Democratic Party stood for the protection of individual rights and of private property; that it was opposed to competition by the Government with private business; that it stood for the abolition of useless and unnecessary bureaus and commissions and against the establishment of any new ones; that it vigorously opposed the encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the State and the interference by the Federal Government in local and State affairs.

I do not own a single share of stock in any public-utility holding company. The only electric-light stock that I own is in the Tampa Electric Co., a company organized under the laws of the State of Florida, doing solely an intrastate business, and not controlled or owned by any public-utility holding company, or any man or set of men.

I want this company to continue to be under the jurisdiction of commissions, municipalities, and bureaus in this State, where I am known and supposed to be an honorable citizen, instead of under the jurisdiction of some Federal agency, where everything I say and do is looked upon with suspicion and everyone connected with a public-utility company as a public enemy.

My grandfather and great-grandfather spent the winter at Valley Forge with Washington. If they should come to life now, they would wonder what sort of liberty and fredom they fought for.

We must have a return to normal times in this country. If things go on as they are, matters will be worse a year from now. How do you expect those who have anything to have any confidence in the situation with the administration advocating this sort of legislation? If the administration deems it wise to regulate public-utility holding companies, why does it not introduce a proper measure with that end in view and not undertake to destroy them or to regulate domestic companies that ought to be regulated exclusively by the respective States?

This bill will affect, directly or indirectly, fully half the people of the United States. Why destroy and affect the interests of so many innocent people because of the alleged misdemeanors and crimes of a few?

Frankly, I hope the measure will fail of passage. It ought to.

The strange thing to me is that officeholders in Washington should think they are honest and that the people are dishonest, and that there should be all sorts of legislation to protect the Government of the United States against its citizens.

Thomas Jefferson always maintained that the best governed country was the least governed country. And such is my thought.

After contemplating the activities of the present administration in the establishment of the T. V. A., which I consider a crime; and the lending of money to municipalities to establish electric companies in competition with existing private ones, which is likewise a crime; the imposition of a tax of 3 percent upon the gross receipts of electric light and power companies and upon no other business; the continued expressed hostility of the Federal Government toward utilities; and after reading carefully all the provisions of the pending public-utility holding bill, I have come to the conclusion that the purpose of the measure is not only to annihilate and destroy existing public-utility holding companies, but that the real purpose of the measure and its enactment into law is to strangle and annihilate in its entirety the electric industry in the United States and to substitute in its place a Government-owned and controlled electric industry. Everything the administration has done and is doing satisfies me of that.

If the enactment of such a measure and the carrying out of such a course amounts to integrity and honesty, then I do not know what integrity and honesty is.

Statistics show that the country's bill for domestic residence consumption amounts to less than 10 cents per capita per day for the families who use it. It is evident that we must look for the war motive elsewhere than in the pressure of "economic necessity."

I judge that the writer of the foregoing letter is a Democrat. I commend it to my Democratic colleagues. I am a Republican, but I subscribe to every word he has said.

Let us look for a moment at some figures. Let us see if there is any basis for the contention that the public is being bled white by exorbitant rates for electricity. Let us look at some of the other items in the household budget. Let us see whether it is electric rates or food prices under the new deal which require congressional intervention. Here are some facts and figures as reported in Barron's Financial Weekly of May 18 of this year:

The Nation's bill for residential electric lighting in 1934 was $677,000,000. Impressive as this figure is, it is approximately one-twenty-fourth as large as the total cost of government in America for the same year, namely $16,500,000,000. It is only about one-fifth as large as the increase in the cost of food in 1935 as compared with 1933. According to estimates by the American Institute of Food Distribution, the country will pay $3,350,000,000 more for its food this year than in 1933.

Furthermore, the cost of electricity to the domestic consumer has actually been declining—quite in contrast to the trend of the cost of living. The average charge for residential electricity has fallen by 6 percent since 1933; whereas food has risen, on the average by 35 percent, clothing by 25 percent, coal 5 percent, and housing 4 percent. Such important items as eggs and flour have risen 77 and 67 percent, respectively.

Supposedly to help consumers to save part of the $677,000,000 paid for home electricity in 1934, governmental attacks upon public-utility companies have been instrumental, if not solely responsible, for reducing the value of investment holdings in listed public-utility stocks by more than $2,900,000,000 since March 1, 1933, a decline of 40 percent. In the same period the value of listed industrial stocks has risen by 97½ percent, and of railroads by 19 percent. Most important of all from the standpoint of reemployment and recovery, the threats to the electric industry have almost stopped construction of new facilities.

There are so many other impelling reasons for rejecting this bill that I am not addressing myself to the constitutional questions involved in this legislation, but it is obvious that this bill raises very serious legal questions and very serious legal doubts.

Time does not permit me to discuss the intricate details of this bill. If, as I believe, the bill is wrong in principle—is unnecessary, is unwarranted, is destined to work incalculable injury—then it becomes not a question of perfecting it but of rejecting it in its entirety.

I intend to vote my convictions on this bill. I commend such a course to my colleagues. I urge them to vote as I intend to do—against the bill—and if this House votes according to its convictions this bill will be rejected. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to insert therein some extracts from various legal opinions and other references to testimony and documents referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, S. 2796, as reported to the House on June 24, 1935, is the result of consideration for many weeks by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of H. R. 5423, a companion bill to the one on the same subject introduced in the Senate. After the Senate bill had passed and was referred to the House committee, the action of the House committee resulted in substitution for the Senate bill, as an amendment thereto, of an entirely new bill, reflecting the views of the majority of the committee in some instances, and the unanimous decision of the committee in many others.

One of the principal attractions service in Congress presents to me is the privilege I have enjoyed for two sessions of being a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This committee, presided over by an able, industrious, and conscientious chairman, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, has in its membership, representing both sides of the aisle, a group of real men, solid in their convictions, firm in their decisions, conscientious and sincere in their deliberations, and above all willing to approach great problems of government in a nonpartisan and noble way. It is true that partisan questions at times become injected into the sessions of the committee, and that is not only to be expected but is a healthy and helpful occurrence. When it comes, however, to the decisions upon those questions, which are admittedly to the best interest of the country, the Members of this House have seldom found a division in the ranks of this committee. I have enjoyed this association and benefited tremendously as a result of it, and I wish all Members of this House could have the same experience, but such is not possible. It is my purpose briefly, because of the limited time I have, to convey in as fair a way as I can my impression of this very important bill, why I view the measure in some respects as I do, and why I think the Members of this House should sustain the report of this committee as you now have it before you.

In order for the Federal Government to control and eliminate public-utility holding companies, as defined in this bill, I think all will agree, from a legal standpoint, we must look mainly to the interstate clause of the Constitution for such authority. This bill is drafted on the theory that the power of the Federal Government granted by the States to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, is broad enough to embody all the ramifying provisions of the bill as having a direct bearing or effect upon the main subject which the Federal Government admittedly can regulate; that is, the interstate transmission and sale of electric energy and natural gas.

There is, of course, no definite decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which can be given as authority for a situation parallel in every respect to that which is embodied in this measure. Such is not expected for the Congress prior to the enactment of legislation, because in this progressive and rapidly growing age we must meet new problems and new conditions with new legislation which gives voice to our conception of the progressive application of precedents of the courts which can fairly be interpreted as applying to this or that new condition. In our desire to meet these new and changing conditions the Congress must not conclude that there is at the hands of the Federal Government a cure-all remedy for any and every situation that arises. In recent months we have had sufficient reprimand and warning to check ourselves in the course we have heretofore pursued, as though we had a cure-all for everything, and I hope Congress is going to take that admonition seriously. It is peculiarly appropriate that we have some discussion along this line at a time when a bill known to so many of our people is on the floor, sponsored as it is by a committee of the House which was established and exists primarily to deal with legislation affecting commerce between the States and foreign countries. Too much legislation which we have considered in the last few years, having as almost its sole basis to withstand attack in the courts the fact that it regulated interstate commerce, has been reported to the House by committees thoroughly competent but not established to deal with that subject. From a parliamentary standpoint it is easy to appreciate why this should be, as much of the legislation embodies many subjects, and more than one committee can, therefore, have jurisdiction. The point I am trying to make is that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has before it at all times, blazoned in a most warning fashion, the challenge that what we deal with is by virtue of specific provisions of the Constitution, and the limitations imposed thereon by the courts must guide us in our deliberations. Starting with this limitation or definition of power, the Interstate Committee of the House, until the last two sessions, reported over a period of many years practically all important legislation dealing with interstate commerce, or having the regulation thereof as a basis for the constitutionality of the measure dealing with subjects beyond the everyday conception of what interstate activities really are. Railroads, telegraph, telephone, radio, and activities closely associated therewith—such as stock exchanges, railroad labor, and others too numerous to mention—have been the everyday consideration, in one form or another, of the members of the Interstate Committee through correspondence, conference, or in committee sessions.

The members of the Interstate Committee, familiar as they are with the jurisdiction the committee enjoys, is cognizant of the fact that commerce and trade, and the regulation thereof or the lack of regulation thereof, between the Colonies and the mother country, was the controlling factor in bringing about the independence of this country and later the Constitution of the United States. Following the Revolution, the Colonies attempted to go along without a strong Federal Government, but the expected difficulties which arose as to imports and exports and trade and commerce in general caused an intolerable condition, and one that many prophesied would defeat, as the British tried to encourage, the ability of the 13 separate Colonies to function as such. The meetings at Annapolis and later in Philadelphia were called primarily to deal with this subject, and in doing so there developed an obvious necessity for some governing body to control certain phases and activities of government essential to assure a unity among the Colonies. This resulted in the United States and a Constitution, wherein the States surrendered certain powers they enjoyed to the exclusion of any other government, and retained to themselves everything not specifically delegated to the National Government. One of these powers granted the National Government was the familiar article I, section 8, clause 3 of the Constitution; that is—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

The courts have been liberal in their interpretation of this language of the Constitution; and, as I read the trend of the decisions, I think it is most apparent that with the proper factual basis for enactment of legislation by Congress dealing with interstate commerce, all the Federal regulation thereof that is necessary or expedient can be supplied. While the courts have construed this provision liberally, at the same time they have said that the privilege or right given to the Federal Government must not be exceeded or abused.

It is not difficult in these times to interpret liberally the provisions of the National Constitution and find support therefor. The trouble is, however, that many untrained and impractical theorists, lacking the conception of government which not only study but association with the fundamentals and ideals of the Government engender, inject the entirely too radical and all-inclusive idea that the Federal Government can usurp many, yes, major functions of the States.

I say it should not be difficult because our oldest precedents defined the flexibility and liberality of the aforegoing provision of the Constitution and at the same time read into it those limitations we should recognize. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland et al. (4 Wheat. 579 (1819) 601), said:

Although, among the enumerated powers of government, we do not find the word "bank" or "incorporation", we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the Nation, are intrusted to its Government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may with great reason be contended that a government intrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the Nation so vitally depend, must also be intrusted with ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the Nation to facilitate its execution.

As to the nature and extent of the grant of power to the Congress on this subject, also of the relations expressed and implied, let me quote again Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbon v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1), wherein he said:

The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the Nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself (p. 195).

The theory of that great opinion is discussed at length in the important case of Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S. 1 (1888)). For the information of the House I quote at length from that decision:

The questions, then, for this Court to determine are: (1) Does the statute as thus construed conflict with section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States by undertaking to regulate commerce between the States; and (2) does it conflict with the fourteenth amendment of that Constitution by depriving the owners of the distillery of their property therein without "due process of law"? All of the assignments of error offered are but variant statements of one or the other of these two propositions.

* * * The only question before us, therefore, is as to the relation of the Iowa statutes to the regulation of commerce among the States. (Italics are mine.)

The line which separates the province of Federal authority over the regulation of commerce, from the powers reserved to the States, has engaged the attention of this Court in a great number and variety of cases. The decisions in these cases, though they do not in a single instance assume to trace that line throughout its entire extent, or to state any rule further than to locate the line in each particular case as it arises, have almost uniformly adhered to the fundamental principles which Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1), laid down as to the nature and extent of the grant of power to Congress on this subject, and also of the limitations, expressed and implied, which it imposes upon State legislation with regard to taxation, to the control of domestic commerce, and to all persons and things within its limits, of purely internal concern.

According to the theory of that great opinion, the supreme authority in this country is divided between the Government of the United States, whose action extends over the whole Union, but which possesses only certain powers enumerated in its written Constitution, and the separate governments of the several States, which retain all powers not delegated to the Union. The power expressly conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce is absolute and complete in itself, with no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution; is to a certain extent exclusively vested in Congress, so far free from State action; is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and cannot stop at the external boundary of a State, but must enter into the interior of every State whenever required by the interests of commerce with foreign nations or among the several States. This power, however, does not comprehend the purely internal domestic commerce of a State which is carried on between man and man within a State or between different parts of the same State.

Referring to certain laws of State legislatures which had a remote and considerable influence on commerce, the Court said that the acknowledged power of the State to regulate its police, its domestic trade, and to govern its own people may enable it to legislate over this subject to a great extent; but these and other State laws of the same kind are not considered as an exercise of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, or enacted with a view to it; but, on the contrary, are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the safety and welfare of its people, and form a part of that legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the general Government. Sacred, however, as these reserved powers are regarded, the Court is particular to declare with emphasis the supreme and paramount authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States, relating to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States; and that whenever these reserved powers, or any of them, are so exercised as to come in conflict with the free course of the powers vested in Congress, the law of the State must yield to the supremacy of the Federal authority, though such law may have been enacted in the exercise of a power undelegated and indisputably reserved to the States.

In the light of these principles, and those which this Court in its numerous decisions has added in illustration and more explicit development, it will not be difficult to determine whether the law of Iowa under consideration invades, either in purpose or effect, the domain of Federal authority.

With equal force and clarity I might cite many decisions of the Supreme Court, but for the sake of brevity let me conclude with the last word on the subject found in the case of Schechter Poultry Corporation against United States, decided by the Supreme Court May 27, 1935, wherein Mr. Chief Justice Hughes said:

In determining how far the Federal Government may go in controlling intrastate transactions upon the ground that they "affect" interstate commerce, there is a necessary and well-established distinction between direct and indirect effects. The precise line can be drawn only as individual cases arise, but the distinction is clear in principle. Direct effects are illustrated by the railroad cases we have cited, as e. g., the effect of failure to use prescribed safety appliances on railroads which are the highways of both interstate and intrastate commerce, injury to an employee engaged in interstate transportation by the negligence of an employee engaged in an intrastate movement, the fixing of rates for intrastate transportation which unjustly discriminate against interstate commerce. But where the effect of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce is merely indirect, such transactions remain within the domain of State power. If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the Federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people and the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the Federal Government. Indeed, on such a theory, even the development of the State's commercial facilities would be subject to Federal control. As we said in the Minnesota Rate Cases (230 U. S. 352, 410): "In the intimacy of commercial relations, much that is done in the superintendence of local matters may have an indirect bearing upon interstate commerce. The development of local resources and the extension of local facilities may have a very important effect upon communities less favored and to an appreciable degree alter the course of trade. The freedom of local trade may stimulate interstate commerce, while restrictive measures within the police power of the State enacted exclusively with respect to internal business, as distinguished from interstate traffic, may in their reflex or indirect influence diminish the latter and reduce the volume of articles transported into or out of the State." (See also, Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S. 1, 21), Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co. (260 U. S. 245, 259, 260).)

The distinction between direct and indirect effects has been clearly recognized in the application of the Antitrust Act. Where a combination or conspiracy is formed, with the intent to restrain interstate commerce or to monopolize any part of it, the violation of the statute is clear (Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 268 U. S. 295, 310). But where that intent is absent, and the objectives are limited to intrastate activities, the fact that there may be an indirect effect upon interstate commerce does not subject the parties to the Federal statute, notwithstanding its broad provisions. This principle has frequently been applied in litigation growing out of labor disputes (United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co., 259 U. S. 344, 410 411; United Leather Workers v. Herkert, 265 U. S. 457, 464–467; Industrial Association v. United States, 268 U. S. 64, 82; Levering & Garrigues Co. v. Morrin, 289 U. S. 103, 107, 108). In the case last cited we quoted with approval the rule that had been stated and applied in Industrial Association v. United States, supra, after review of the decisions, as follows: "The alleged conspiracy and the acts here complained of, spent their intended and direct force upon a local situation—for building is as essentially local as mining, manufacturing, or growing crops—and if, by resulting diminution of the commercial demand, interstate trade was curtailed either generally or in specific instances, that was a fortuitous consequence so remote and indirect as plainly to cause it to fall outside the reach of the Sherman Act."

While these decisions related to the application of the Federal statute, and not to its constitutional validity, the distinction between direct and indirect effects of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce must be recognized as a fundamental one, essential to the maintenance of our constitutional system. Otherwise, as we have said, there would be virtually no limit to the Federal power and for all practical purposes we should have a completely centralized government. We must consider the provisions here in question in the light of this distinction.

* * * * * * *

If the Federal Government may determine the wages and hours of employees in the internal commerce of a State, because of their relation to cost and prices and their indirect effect upon interstate commerce, it would seem that a similar control might be exerted over other elements of cost, also affecting prices, such as the number of employees, rents, advertising, methods of doing business, etc. All the processes of production and distribution that enter into cost could likewise be controlled. If the cost of doing an intrastate business is in itself the permitted object of Federal control, the extent of the regulation of cost would be a question of discretion and not of power.

* * * * * * *

It is not the province of the Court to consider the economic advantages or disadvantages of such a centralized system. It is sufficient to say that the Federal Constitution does not provide for it. Our growth and development have called for wide use of the commerce power of the Federal Government in its control over the expanded activities of interstate commerce, and in protecting that commerce from burdens, interferences, and conspiracies to restrain and monopolize it. But the authority of the Federal Government may not be pushed to such an extreme as to destroy the distinction, which the commerce clause itself establishes, between commerce "among the several States" and the internal concerns of a State.

In a concurring opinion in the foregoing Schechter case, Mr. Justice Cardozo made the following statement:

I find no authority in that grant for the regulation of wages and hours of labor in the intrastate transactions that make up the defendants' business. As to this feature of the case little can be added to the opinions of the court. There is a view of causation that would obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local in the activities of commerce. Motion at the outer rim is communicated perceptibly, though minutely, to recording instruments at the center. A society such as ours "is an elastic medium which transmits all tremors through its territory; the only question is of their size." Per Learned Hand, judge, in the court below. The law is not indifferent to considerations of degree. Activities local in their immediacy do not become interstate and national because of distant repercussions. What is near and what is distant may at times be uncertain. Cf. Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1). There is no penumbra of uncertainty obscuring judgment here. To find immediacy or directness here is to find it almost everywhere. If centripetal forces are to be isolated to the exclusion of the forces that oppose and counteract them, there will be an end to our Federal system.

I commend to the members of this Committee, and especially to those Members who are lawyers, not only the aforegoing facts and recitals of existing law, but the study of the legal application of the commerce clause of the Constitution. You will find it interesting, consoling, and illuminating. Interesting, because of the firmness with which the courts have adhered to what I believe to be the meaning and intent of the framers of our Constitution; consoling, because it destroys totally the cry of many at this time who would amend, yes wreck, our Constitution in order to set up a Government of men in place of a Government of laws; illuminating, because in the busy rush and hubbub of everyday life of a Member of Congress, not having the time to divorce himself from the many troublesome problems of Government and of constituents, to do so, with this subject as your companion, during a period of seclusion with your own thought and conscience, you will find a reaffirmance of that confidence in the basic law of the Government under which we live as instilled into you during the days as a law student. It will recall those solid and sound arguments advanced by you in the defense of the rights of your clients during the days at the trial table, which many of us have been forced to lay aside. In the end I predict you will find yourself, if not now, then rejoicing, in the satisfaction you will receive in saying that the trouble with unconstitutional legislation, embarrassing, of course, to a Congressman who has voted for it, is not the fault of the basic law under which we operate, or the interpretation of the courts thereof, but with the overzealous desire and ambition of some who, without mature judgment and thought, have tried through the instrumentalities of the Government to cure with one sweep the effects, known and unknown, of a great debacle which came upon us partly because we had failed in our duty in the past to provide in a constitutional way against some of the causes thereof.

As was recently said by a great jurist of my own State, Judge T. Scott Offutt:

The plan of empowering a court to nullify all legislative and executive acts which violate rights expressly guaranteed by a written constitution was a unique discovery in political science, the peculiar precedent of the genius of the American people. It established for the first time in the history of organized government, a government of law.

* * * So long as the Constitution endures and the powers of the Supreme Court remain unimpaired, it will continue a Government of law, and the customary rights of the people will be protected.

* * * Obviously a despotism, whether of a mob, a dictator, or a group where freedom of conscience, or thought, and of act comes as a matter of grace and not of right affords no such protection.

* * * In this land the only barrier against such tyranny is the Supreme Court, the watchman and the guardian of the Constitution. Throughout its history it has been the object of virulent and venomous attacks by powerful and influential interests who sought to sell the Constitution to serve their ends. But throughout its history it has stood steadfast, courageous, and unmovable, the greatest of American institutions, which has preserved inviolate America's ideal of a government of law.

The bill before us, as I see it, has a twofold objective: First, the control and, under certain conditions, the elimination of public utility holding companies in the electric and gas fields. Second, to vest in the Federal Power Commission powers over electric-utility companies engaged in interstate commerce comparable to the powers now vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to railroads. After many weeks of hearings on the entire bill subcommittees were appointed, and I was assigned to the committee dealing with titles II and III or title II—which contained the second point as outlined—and also title III of the original bill dealing with natural gas, which title was eliminated by the House committee in its report to the House.

While I have very definite views as to some sections of title I, especially section 11 thereof, to which I shall briefly refer later, I want to discuss at some length that part of the bill with which I have been most intimately associated in its preparation and final draft as you now find it.

Title II, as it passed the Senate, applied to not only the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce but to the production and generation thereof. The bill, furthermore, ignored in many ways not only the prerogatives but the existing regulatory provisions by the States of certain activities covered therein. Having in mind that these public-utilities companies, by virtue of the regulation imposed in title I and of the existing regulations thereunder in the States, title II further imposed the burden of another commission being over them.

In the original bill there was broad power given to the Commission to establish zones throughout the country and to force interconnections and coordination of facilities and service so as to subject the utilities in a mandatory fashion to those so-called "integrated and geographically established areas" as determined by the Commission.

The original bill, in its effort to establish rates and make valuations on a basis therefor, contained language which has since been conceded by those drafting the bill to be unconstitutional. As now recommended by the committee, the bill is limited in its provisions to the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce and the facilities connected therewith and excludes generation and production therefrom.

As to the jurisdiction of the States and State commissions, I doubt if any State commission or State officials familiar with the bill as it is now before you will say that the jurisdiction of the States has not been safeguarded and protected in a fair and lawful way. In doing so we have tried—and I think successfully—to avoid the injection into the Federal control, which this title confers, the extension thereof into intrastate activities in the way that the Shreveport case might permit. Seeing the wisdom of dividing the country into regular districts for the interconnection and coordination of facilities for the generation, transmission, and sale of electric energy, the bill now provides for the Commission to make a study and findings to that end. It shall be the duty of the Commission thereafter to promote and encourage such interconnection and coordination with the districts or areas deemed advisable, but such interconnection and coordination shall be imposed only by voluntary action on the part of the public utilities affected. Having in mind that such areas or districts will be established and much of the recommendations connected therewith will be adopted through voluntary action, we have vested the Commission with the power to compel physical connections and to sell energy or exchange energy with other utilities, all of which is to be done, following application therefor by any State commission or person engaged in the transmission or sale of electric energy, under certain limits set forth in the bill.

Of real importance, the Commission has very definite jurisdiction over the sale, lease, or other disposition of facilities subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission. Securities bought and sold by utilities under this title are regulated and controlled in a very definite way. When, however, a security issue is approved by the Federal Power Commission, then, as in the case of railroad securities approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, copies of the reports filed with the Federal Power Commission are to be accepted by the Securities and Exchange Commission in lieu of reports, information, and documents required under sections 12 and 13 of the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934. This we have felt to be fair because of much duplication of the many and voluminous reports which the public utilities are required to make to any commission exercising jurisdiction over them, which is not only burdensome and expensive on the utilities but unnecessary as we see it and also expensive to the Federal Government. The Commission is empowered to determine the value of properties used in production and transmission of electric energy and to fix the rates and charges therefor. This is confined, naturally, to such part of the business as the Commission controls, leaving to the States that which is of intrastate character. The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of West and others against Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. of Baltimore City, delivered June 3, 1935, has been most helpful in connection with framing this important section. There is nothing more important, in our judgment, when we come to deal with this entire subject than the setting up of necessary machinery whereby the Federal Government can appraise and value, for rate-making purposes, that part of the electric-utility business which is interstate in character and beyond the jurisdiction of the State regulatory agencies. Much of the delay and expense incident to rate cases conducted by the States has been directly attributable to the technicalities raised and the expense necessary for the State commission to properly cope with the matter.

The bill was originally drawn on the theory that for the purpose of just and reasonable rates the Commission should determine the actual and prudent cost of the property less accrued depreciation thereon. Mr. Justice Roberts, in delivering the opinion of the Court in the Telephone case, supra, made it very clear that such a provision would be unconstitutional and it was therefore stricken out. In lieu thereof there is new language and while that may not be entirely clear, it was inconceivable to those of us serving on the subcommittee that any State or National commission establishing valuation of a public utility for rate purposes should do other than follow the very clear formula or standard now established by the Court. No one consideration alone as to value, such as legitimate cost or prudent cost, is sufficient; but all elements must be taken into account, such as reproduction value, actual cost, going value, proper depreciation allowance, so that in the end, after considering the aforegoing and such other elements of value as are essential, leave a figure upon which the rate established thereon will not be confiscatory. The dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Stone on this case was also most helpful in clearing up the difficulties the commissions and courts have had in stating with definiteness that the theory of rate making outlined in Smith and Ames is still the rule, and if not, how it has been changed, by later decisions.

A provision for the establishment of joint boards between the Federal commissions and the States is contained. A uniform system of accounting is established, and because of the demand therefor and the admission on the part of most everyone that such is advisable, the provisions therefor will very likely be required of companies now subject to State regulation because of a small fraction of their business being under the Federal Commission. We have thought this advisable because it is most necessary to have uniformity in accounting as well as depreciation instead of 48 different methods. This provision will be followed, in my judgment, by the adoption by the State commission of such uniform method as the Federal Power Commission will prescribe. Agencies of the United States are subject to the uniform accounting and depreciation rule established by the Federal Power Commission. The Commission is invested with broad investigating powers to investigate any phase of the industry with which they are dealing and report back its findings to the Congress. Where there is a conflict of jurisdiction between titles I and II, the jurisdiction under title I prevails.

There was considerable debate in the Senate during consideration of this bill as to the inclusion of generation under title II. The subcommittee gave this question a great deal of consideration, both as to the necessity therefor and the legality thereof. We concluded that generation was beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and therefore excluded it. The decision in the Schechter case was considered as to its applicability to the language in the Senate bill, and some felt it would sustain the inclusion of generation while others thought otherwise. The test seems to be, as the proponents for inclusion of generation view it, whether or not generation has such a direct effect upon transmission and sale, and therefore upon the interstate-commerce activities to be regulated, as to bring it within the purview of such regulations. The decision in U. S. v. N. Y. Central (272 U. S. 457, 464) has been cited as authority for the inclusion of generation, and the language of the Court in upholding the power of interstate commerce to compel the interconnection, which is the subject in that case, has been cited to us as authority therefor. To give both sides of the picture, I quote from that case as it has been cited to me:

> The Commission having jurisdiction over the carriers and the facilities by which the transportation is carried on, the question is narrowed to whether its jurisdiction extends to the entire current of commerce flowing through this terminal although intrastate in part. When we consider the nature and extent of the commingling of interstate and intrastate commerce, and the difficulty of segregating the freight passing through the terminal, we think it clear that Congress in employing such broad language as "the Commission shall have full authority to determine and prescribe the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracts shall be operated" intended to confer upon the Commission power to regulate the entire stream of commerce. Where, as here, interstate and intrastate transactions are interwoven, the regulation of the latter is so incidental to and inseparable from the regulation of the former as properly to be deemed included in the authority over interstate commerce conferred by statute. This was the view of the State court (People ex rel. New York Central R. R. v. Public Service Commission, supra. Cf. State of Colorado v. United States, 271 U. S. 153; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich Transit Co., 224 U. S. 194; Dayton-Goose Creek Ry. v. United States, 263 U. S. 456, 485; Texas & Pac. Ry. v. Gulf, etc., Ry., 270 U. S. 266). An interpretation of the statute which would in practice require the segregation of all shipments in interstate commerce would make compliance with the Commission's orders impossible and defeat the purpose of the act.

The same gentlemen quote also the decision of the Supreme Court in Federal Radio v. Nelson Bros. B. and M. Co. (289 U. S. 266), wherein the Court said:

That the Congress had the power to give this authority to delete stations, in view of the limited radio facilities available and the confusion that would result from interferences, is not open to question. Those who operated broadcasting stations had no right superior to the exercise of this power of regulation. They necessarily made their investments and their contracts in the light of, and subject to, this paramount authority. This Court has had frequent occasion to observe that the power of Congress in the regulation of interstate commerce is not fettered by the necessity of maintaining existing agreements which would conflict with the execution of its policy, as such a restriction would place the regulation in the hands of private individuals and withdraw from the control of Congress so much of the field as they might choose by prophetic discernment to bring within the range of their enterprises.

In support of the decision of the committee striking out generation and production from the regulatory control of the Federal Power Commission I present the following brief as supporting the view that Congress cannot regulate the manufacture, generation, or production, or whatever term you might use, of electric energy for transmission in interstate commerce:

The power of Congress to regulate commerce is granted by the United States Constitution in article I, section 8, which provides that "The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

This power, along with others enjoyed by the Federal legislative body, must be construed in connection with article X of the amendments to the United States Constitution, which provides that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

In accordance with this provision, it has long been settled as a fundamental part of our American system of government that the Congress has only those powers which have been expressly delegated to it by the States. This principle was most recently reaffirmed by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Joseph Schechter et al. v. United States of America, decided by a unanimous Court on May 27, 1935.

As the result of litigation in comparatively recent times it has become firmly established that the generation of electric energy constitutes manufacturing and not commerce, and this even though the power generated is at once transmitted across State boundaries and consumed almost simultaneously with its generation in another State. (See South Carolina Power Co. v. South Carolina Tax Commission; Broad River Power Co. v. Query; Lexington Water Power Co. v. Query (52 F. (2d) 515), affirmed April 18, 1932 (286 U. S. 525), per curiam; Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost (May 16, 1932; 286 U. S. 165, 76 L. Ed. 1038).)

In both of the above cases the contention was made and supported by the testimony of the ablest and most distinguished physicists of the country that the generation, transmission, and consumption of electrical energy was of such a nature that where there was generation in one State accompanied by transmission to and consumption in another State, an interstate system was set up, of which the generation was such an integral part as not to be subject to taxation by the State in which the electrical energy was generated.

This contention was stated by Circuit Judge Parker in the South Carolina cases, supra, in the following language:

"The principal questions under the commerce clause of the Constitution (Const. U. S., art. I, sec. 8, cl. 3) are based upon what is said to be the inherent nature of the generation and transmission of electric power. It is said that only so much power is generated as is needed to supply the user; that the whole system is so connected and regulated that, whether produced by water power or by steam, the generators produce only so much current as is called for at any given time by the use made of the current by the customer; that electricity travels at the rate of 186,000 miles per second, with the result that current is generated and transmitted instantaneously to the customer when he signifies his need of it by turning on his light, motor, or other device using current; and that the transmission of current to the customer in interstate commerce must be treated, therefore, as generation and transmission in response to order, which the State cannot burden by taxation * * *."

Similarly in Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost, supra, Mr. Justice Sutherland summarized the same contention in the following language:

"First. Appellant contends that the tax is not one on manufacture or production or on the extraction of a product of nature, but on the transfer or conveyance of energy in nature from its source to its place of use; that, in part, appellant's system consists of generating stations in Idaho and transmission lines across the boundary into Utah, and thence to various consumers, the combined action of which constitutes an operation in interstate commerce; that the energy is brought to the consumers in Utah directly from its source in the water fall; that thus the generator is an instrumentality of interstate commerce; that the process of generation is simultaneous and interdependent with that of transmission and use, and because of their inseparability the whole is interstate commerce; that since the intent of the act is to tax the whole business, and no provision is made for the separate determination of interstate and intrastate business, the act, in burdening interstate commerce, is void in its entirety."

In the first case this contention was analyzed and rejected in an able opinion by Circuit Judge Parker, who said in regard to it in part as follows:

"We think, however, that the argument of complainants ignores, at or least does not accord sufficient importance to, the part played by the transformer in the system of electrical transmission. Electricity is produced at a low voltage. For transmission over long distances it is 'stepped up' by a transformer to a very high voltage; and all of the current transmitted in interstate commerce by complainants is thus 'stepped up' before transmission in such commerce. Before it can be used by the consumer it must be 'stepped down' again to a low voltage; and all of the current received by complainants in interstate commerce is thus stepped down before being sold or used by the consumer. * * *

"Now, as far as the production or generation tax on current is concerned, there can be no question as to its validity as applied to current transmitted in interstate commerce, we think, even though the current transmitted be conceived of as the identical current produced. The production of an article for transmission in interstate commerce is not in itself such commerce (United Leather Workers' International Union, Local Lodge or Union No. 66 v. Herkert, 265 U. S. 457, 45 S. Ct. 623, 68 L. Ed. 1104, 33 A. L. R. 566; United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co., 259 U. S. 344, 42 S. Ct. 570, 66 L. Ed. 975, 27 A. L. R. 762; Delaware L. & W. R. R. v. Yurkonis, 238 U. S. 439, 35 S. Ct. 902, 59 L. Ed. 1397). And there can be no question but that such production is taxable by the State.

"* * * Even if the current sold be considered as the current which is brought in, it has gone through a process in which it has been 'broken up' or changed from one current of high voltage to many currents of low voltage; and it is these many currents of low voltage sold within the State upon the sale of which the tax is levied. While electric current can hardly be said to 'come to rest' within a State, its interstate journey ends at the transformer which uses it for the production of low-voltage currents for use within the State. The situation is the same in principle as the breaking up of an original package after shipment in interstate commerce (cf. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 443; 6 L. Ed. 678), or the breaking up of a cargo of oil after its interstate journey and the sending of it in tank cars to the points where needed within the State (Atlantic C. L. R. Co. v. Bell, 275 U. S. 257, 48 S. Ct. 107, 72 L. Ed. 270; Atlantic C. L. R. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. (C. C. A. 4th) 12 F. (2d) 541, 60 A. L. R. 1456), or the distribution of gas in low-pressure pipes after it has been brought into the State in high-pressure pipes in interstate commerce (East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Commission of Ohio, 283 U. S. 465, 51 S. Ct. 499, 500, 75 L. Ed. 1171)."

To the same effect, see also the later opinion of Judge Parker in dismissing the bills of complaint in the same cases on subsequent hearings, reported in Sixtieth Federal (2d), 528.

And see Broad River Power Co. v. Query (288 U. S. 178, 181; 77 L. Ed. 685, 687); Mill Creek Coal & Coke Co. v. Public Service Commission (84 W. Va. 662, 669; 100 S. E. 557; 7 A. L. R. 1081).

The same conclusion was reached a few months later by the United States Supreme Court in Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost, in a unanimous decision, in which Mr. Justice Sutherland said in this regard in part as follows:

"The various specific objections to the findings made below and the failure to adopt others suggested by appellant become immaterial in view of our conclusions. We are satisfied, upon consideration of the whole case, that the process of generation is as essentially local as though electrical energy were a physical thing, and to that situation we must apply, as controlling the general rule that commerce does not begin until manufacture is finished, and hence the commerce clause of the Constitution does not prevent the State from exercising exclusive control over the manufacturer" (Cornell v. Coyne (192 U. S. 418, 428, 429; 48 L. Ed. 504, 508, 509; 24 S. Ct. 393)). "Commerce succeeds manufacture, and is not a part of it" (United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S. 1, 12; 39 L. Ed. 325, 329; 15 S. Ct. 249)).

"Without regard to the apparent continuity of the movement, appellant, in effect, is engaged in two activities, not in one only. So far as it produces electrical energy in Idaho, its business is purely intrastate, subject to State taxation and control. * * *" (Citing Oliver Iron Mining Co. v. Lord (262 U. S. 172; 67 L. Ed. 929); Hope Natural Gas Co. v. Hall (274 U. S. 284; 71 L. Ed. 1049).)

The same line of reasoning has been adopted by the Supreme Court in holding the local distribution of interstate gas to be intrastate commerce (East Ohio Gas Co. v. Tax Commission (283 U. S. 465; 75 L. Ed. 1171)). And see also Eastern Air Transport v. South Carolina Tax Commission (285 U. S. 147; 67 L. Ed. 673); West Virginia & Maryland Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (134 Md. 137).

The contention has been made that the above authorities concern only the validity of State taxes, which the Supreme Court will sustain, if at all possible, but are not controlling on the question of Federal control over the same subject matter.

It may truthfully be said that no decision of the United States Supreme Court can be cited making any such distinction between such classes of cases. Indeed, this contention would seem to have been finally and definitely answered by the United States Supreme Court in the very recent Schechter case, where it was decided by a unanimous Court that Congress had no power to exercise Federal control over intrastate business indirectly affecting or affected by interstate commerce.

As the result of the decision by the Supreme Court in Utah Light & Power Co. v. Pfost, supra, it is now settled that the generation of electric energy for transmission in interstate commerce is not itself interstate commerce but manufacture. And it has long been established that manufacturing not only is not interstate commerce, but does not even constitute commerce.

A leading authority on this point is Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S. 1, 32 L. Ed. 346). In that case the facts disclosed that the plaintiff was a manufacturer of intoxicating liquor, none of which was sold within the State and all of which was exported in interstate commerce. It was held by the Supreme Court that the manufacturing question did not constitute commerce and a fortiori; it did not constitute interstate commerce. In that regard, Mr. Justice Lamar said on behalf of a unanimous Court, in part, as follows:

"No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S. 691, 702 (26:238, 241)), is as follows: 'Commerce with foreign nations and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities.' If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufacture, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest, and the cotton planter of the South, plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are, and must be, local in all the details of their successful management.

"It is not necessary to enlarge on, but only to suggest, the impracticability of such a scheme, when we regard the multitudinous affairs involved, and the almost infinite variety of their minute details."

* * * * * * *

"This being true, how can it further that object so to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicated? The demands of such a supervision would require, not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rules of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantages of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such an interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for, Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market. These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen; but still there would always remain the possibility, and often it would be the case that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State; and the interminable trouble would be presented, that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined, not by any general or intelligible rule, but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments, and more provocative of conflicts between the General Government and the States, and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended, it would be difficult to imagine."

In Oliver Iron Mining Co. v. Lord (262 U. S. 172, 67 L. Ed. 929), cited with approval by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost, supra, it was held that the mining of iron ore did not constitute interstate commerce even though practically all of the production of the mines was immediately shipped out of the State on cars which were run to the mines and loaded from pockets to which the underground ore had been elevated, or even by steam shovels directly from the open pits. In that case Mr. Justice Van Devanter said on this point as follows:

"Plainly the facts do not support the contention. Mining is not interstate commerce, but like manufacturing is a local business subject to local regulation and taxation (citing many cases). Its character in this regard is intrinsic, is not affected by the intended use or disposal of the product, is not controlled by contractual engagements, and persists even though the business be conducted in close connection with interstate commerce (citing many cases)."

It would unduly lengthen the scope of this memorandum to abstract and quote, or even to cite, all of the scores of cases in which the Supreme Court has said that manufacturing is a local matter subject to the taxing and police powers of the State, but subject to no regulation on the part of Congress. One of the strongest opinions on this point, and one of the most pertinent, because most recent, is that delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Hughes on behalf of a unanimous Court in the case of Joseph Schechter et al. v. United States of America, decided May 27, 1935. There it was held that the business of selling at wholesale poultry almost in its entirety obtained in interstate commerce was intrastate in character and affected interstate commerce so remotely and indirectly that Congress could not prescribe regulations as to hours and wages of labor employed in the business. Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, in holding invalid an act which imposed not a State tax but regulation by Congress, said in part as follows:

"Direct effects are illustrated by the railroad cases we have cited, as e. g., the effect of failure to use prescribed safety appliances on railroads which are the highways of both interstate and intrastate commerce, injury to an employee engaged in interstate transportation by the negligence of an employee engaged in intrastate movement, the fixing of rates for intrastate transportation which unjustly discriminate against interstate commerce. But where the effect of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce is merely indirect such transactions remain within the domain of State power.

"If the commerce clause were construed to reach all enterprises and transactions which could be said to have an indirect effect upon interstate commerce, the Federal authority would embrace practically all the activities of the people and the authority of the State over its domestic concerns would exist only by sufferance of the Federal Government. Indeed, on such a theory, even the development of the State's commercial facilities would be subject to Federal control.

"As we said in the Minnesota Rate cases (230 U. S. 352, 410): 'In the intimacy of commercial relations, much that is done in the superintendence of local matters may have an indirect bearing upon interstate commerce. The development of local resources and the extension of local facilities may have a very important effect upon communities less favored and to an appreciable degree alter the course of trade. The freedom of local trade may stimulate interstate commerce, while restrictive measures within the police power of the State enacted exclusively with respect to internal business, as distinguished from interstate traffic, may in their reflex or indirect influence diminish the latter and reduce the volume of articles transported into or out of the State.' See also Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S. 1, 21); Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co. (260 U. S. 245, 259, 260)."

* * * * * * *

"While these decisions related to the application of the Federal statute, and not to its constitutional validity, the distinction between direct and indirect effects of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce must be recognized as a fundamental one, essential to the maintenance of our constitutional system. Otherwise, as we have said, there would be virtually no limit to the Federal power and for all practical purposes we should have a completely centralized Government. We must consider the provisions here in question in the light of this distinction.

"The question of chief importance relates to the provisions of the code as to the hours and wages of those employed in defendants' slaughterhouse markets. It is plain that these requirements are imposed in order to govern the details of defendants' management of their local business. The persons employed in slaughtering and selling in local trade are not employed in interstate commerce. Their hours and wages have no direct relation to interstate commerce. The question of how many hours these employees should work and what they should be paid differs in no essential respect from similar questions in other local businesses which handle commodities brought into a State and there dealt in as a part of its internal commerce. This appears from an examination of the considerations urged by the Government with respect to conditions in the poultry trade."

Nor does the fact that a person makes a wide use of the mails incidental to a business intrastate in character render such business interstate and subject to Federal as distinguished from State control (New York Life Insurance Co. v. Cravens, 178 U. S. 389, 44 L. Ed. 1116; New York Life Insurance Co. v. Deer Lodge County, 231 U. S. 495, 58 L. Ed. 332).

In the case last cited such a contention by an insurance company doing a Nation-wide business between citizens of a great many States was denied by Mr. Justice McKenna (at p. 509 of 231 U. S., p. 338 of 58 L. Ed.) in the following language:

"* * * Nor does the character of the contracts change by their numbers or the residence of the parties. The latter is made much of in this case. It was made much of in the Cravens case. The effort has been to give a special locality to the contracts and determine their applicatory law, and, indeed, to a centralization of control, to employ local agents, but to limit their power and judgment. To accomplish the purpose there is necessarily a great and frequent use of the mails, and this is elaborately dwelt on by the insurance company in its pleading and argument, it being contended that this and the transmission of premiums and the amounts of the policies constitute a 'current of commerce among the States.' This use of the mails is necessary, it may be, to the centralization of the control and supervision of the details of the business; it is not essential to its character. And we may say, in passing, that such effort has led to regulating legislation, but that it cannot determine its validity was decided in the Cravens case. (See also Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Clements (Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Pettus), 140 U. S. 226, 35 L. Ed. 497, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 822.)

"This legislation is in effect attacked by the contention of the insurance company. We have already pointed out that if insurance is commerce and becomes interstate commerce whenever it is between citizens of different States, then all control over it is taken from the States, and the legislative regulations which this Court has heretofore sustained must be declared invalid.

"The number of transactions does not give the business any other character than magnitude. If it did, the department store which deals with every article which covers or adorns the human body, or, it may be, nourishes it, would have one character, while its neighbor, humble in the variety and extent of its stock, would have another. Nor, again, does the use of the mails determine anything. Certainly not that which takes place before and after the transaction between the plaintiff and its agents in secret or in regulation of their relations. But put agents to one side and suppose the insurance company and the applicant negotiating or consummating a contract. That they may live in different States and hence use the mails for their communications does not give character to what they do; cannot make a personal contract the transportation of commodities from one State to another, to paraphrase Paul v. Virginia. Such might be incidents of a sale of real estate (certainly nothing can be more immobile). Its transfer may be negotiated through the mails and completed by the transmission of the consideration and the instrument of transfer also through the mails."

Many other cases to the same effect might be cited and quoted at length. See, however, especially Coe v. Errol (116 U. S. 517, 29 L. Ed. 715), Mobile County v. Kimball (102 U. S. 691, 26 L. Ed. 238), United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325), Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251, 62 L. Ed. 1101), Heisler v. Thomas Colliery (260 U. S. 245, 67 L. Ed. 237), Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co. (259 U. S. 20, 66 L. Ed. 817).

CONCLUSION

In view of the above authorities, it would now seem to be clearly established that the generation of electricity in one State for transmission to and consumption in another is not interstate commerce, but constitutes intrastate business which Congress has no constitutional power to regulate or control.

Title I, section 11, of the Senate bill is known as the "death sentence", while in the House bill it is more of a regulatory provision.

The basis for legislation of this magnitude, as in the case of legislation of comparable importance, generally follows factual findings which results from study made by Congress, or some agency of the Federal Government, at the suggestion or request of Congress. It does not, it should not, be initiated solely to satisfy the whim of this or that individual, whether he be a Member of Congress or not, until very convincing proof in support thereof has been submitted. In the case of our electric utilities, fortunately we have the benefit of many complete and highly instructive investigations. At the suggestion of Congress, acting under resolutions sponsored by the late Senator Walsh, the Federal Trade Commission started years ago to investigate public utilities in order to determine many things, but primarily the necessity for more satisfactory and effective regulation. We have in seventy-odd volumes the report of the Federal Trade Commission, and it would tax the patience of any man to attempt to even read, let alone absorb, all of the great mass of material contained therein. As a result of that study it was not recommended that holding companies be eliminated arbitrarily on some specific date, but that their activities be curtailed through drastic regulatory measures. I am not quoting the exact language, but, in substance, I think this is about the meat of the recommendation. At the time this investigation was started by the Federal Trade Commission in 1928, the Honorable Robert E. Healy, a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission since July 1934, was chief counsel of the Federal Trade Commission and, as he stated to the committee, he cooperated closely with the chief economist, Dr. Walker, and his assistant, Colonel England, who had primarily charge of and responsibility for gathering the facts as to the financial and economical aspects of the industry. Let us see what Commissioner Healy, whose judgment in this matter certainly cannot be challenged by anyone with superior knowledge, has to say about the so-called "death sentence" as imposed in the Senate bill and the bill as originally introduced in the House. In the testimony of Commissioner Healy before the committee, page 148, part 1, he made this statement:

I should think that good regulation would promote the final elimination of the companies.

Commissioner Healy recommended changes in the bill as introduced and as to section 11 and made the following statement as part of his testimony:

Now, at that point, I suggest that there are three courses appropriate to consider. One is to limit the time, as the bill does now, for which that action may be deferred to the 1st of January 1940; the other is to slightly increase the term beyond 1940; and still the third is to say that the Commission may defer action in such cases for such period, but only such period, as the circumstances make necessary.

My own preference is for the third course. My reasons are principally that I think the objective stated is a good one, one that we ought to move toward, but it seems to me that it is wise to leave to the Commission that administers this act a good deal of discretion as to the time and circumstances under which it shall be done.

Other extracts from evidence of Commissioner Healy are:

This is the section where elimination is provided for, and it is in connection with this section or it is about that section that the debate here before the committee has revolved.

The plan, as I see it, still holds out to the holding companies the inducement that is found in the subdivision (A) at page 38, beginning with line 3, to try to build up these geographically and economically integrated systems through the country. If the company wishes to continue under those conditions, there is an incentive to accomplish that particular objective which the policy of this act seeks to promote. The desire to continue should promote the establishment of such systems.

At the same time, if the holding company shows under this new proposed subsection (C) that the dissolution will work substantial injury to the investors and that it is really against the public interest, then it gives the Commission a discretion not to put it through. The bill, in addition, gives the courts the right to review the Commission's findings and orders on this point as well as on others in the bill.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MAPES. You think it would be more desirable to have an arbitrary provision in than it would be to leave it entirely to the discretion of the Commission; is that right?

Commissioner HEALY. What you have under my suggestion is a combination of the two. It is an arbitrary provision, but the companies can escape it if they make a certain showing to the Commission. One is that the compliance with the arbitrary provision will work substantial injury to the investors; second, that the compliance is against the public interest.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that it will work great hardship between now and 1940 for these people to be organized into regional operating companies? That certainly seems to me to be one of the very vital things in this bill; that is, this remote control that Mr. HUDDLESTON has been talking about here this morning, not only in the layers of sub holding companies, but in their operations.

Commissioner HEALY. If this suggested amendment works the way I think it will, or the way it is intended to, they will still be under the obligation to do that unless they can make this showing to the satisfaction of the Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. On the ground of public policy, what do you think about it?

Commissioner HEALY. I think that we should look to the eventual elimination of the holding company.

The CHAIRMAN. But I am talking about this regional business of operations.

Commissioner HEALY. I think that is very desirable. I think it is a good national ideal to work toward. I would not be surprised if such a movement would get considerable cooperation from some of the operating companies, but I think we ought to move into it carefully and gradually. I think that stating the objectives of the bill and then giving the Commission some tolerance, some room in which to exercise wise discretion, will get the desired result, doing at the same time the least amount of harm.

I commend to you the reading of Commissioner Healy's testimony to a greater extent than I have set forth herein. My reason for quoting Commissioner Healy at such length is not only because I have respect for his ability and because he was so intimately associated with the investigation conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, but because he is now a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, which Commission administers title I of this bill.

In compliance with House Joint Resolution 572 of the Seventy-second Congress, second session, the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce conducted an investigation of certain public-utility corporations engaged in interstate commerce. This was a continuance of a previous investigation under the same resolution of natural gas and electric utility companies in great detail. Dr. Splawn, now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, was employed by the committee to conduct this investigation, and he has submitted a detailed summary thereof with many recommendations. While Dr. Splawn approved in substance provisions of the bill as originally introduced, I think it fair to say that in advocating the elimination of useless and unnecessary holding companies—which I personally favor—it should be done by a thorough method of taxation. To sustain this impression of Dr. Splawn's study, you will find very elaborate briefs as to the law prepared by eminent attorneys, in which the tax features are discussed at great length, but no place do we find where Dr. Splawn presented, as a result of the work of the attorneys associated with him, any legal support for the bill as it was introduced. I think it safe to say—and I would ask for this statement to be contradicted if it is not true—that not a single attorney associated with Dr. Splawn in the very wonderful work he did for this committee in response to a House resolution, assisted in the drafting of the House bill introduced in February 1935, or has given sanction since its introduction to the legal philosophy it embodies. The National Power Policy Committee on Public Utility Holding Companies, appointed by the President of the United States in 1934, made up of men associated with various departments of the Government, and the National Power Survey, made by the Federal Power Commission upon the direction of the President of the United States under Executive order August 1933, are also available. The President in his message to Congress on this subject, dated May 12, 1935, transmitted therewith the report of the National Power Policy Company aforesaid. This report made to the President by a committee consisting of the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, chairman; Frank R. McNinch, member of the Federal Power Commission; Elwood Mead; T. W. Norcross; Morris L. Cooke, now in charge of the rural electrification program for the Government; Hon. Robert E. Healy, former counsel to the Federal Trade Commission and now a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission; David E. Lilienthal, of the Tennessee Valley Corporation; and Edward M. Markham, did not recommend the complete elimination of holding companies within any definite time. What that committee did in the report upon which President Roosevelt places so much reliance, and which I am willing to concede very accurately pictures many of the past and present abuses of the holding company system, was more in agreement with the bill now before the House, as reported by our committee, than it is with the Senate bill or the bill as originally introduced in the House. I say this particularly as to section 11 thereof.

In brief, this committee recommended Federal legislation regarding public-utility holding companies, so that disclosed abuses would be eliminated, the use of holding companies and affiliated interests to obstruct State regulation of operating companies be abolished, and the elimination of holding companies where they serve no demonstrable use and necessary purpose without undue dislocation of investment or the loss of operating economies which flow from economically and geographically integrating public-utility systems. On that part of their recommendations dealing with the company so prominently in this discussion the committee had this to say:

> The ultimate purpose of the legislation should be the practical elimination within a reasonable time of the holding company where it serves no demonstrably useful and necessary purpose. But the amount of reorganization, transfers of assets, and distributions in dissolution required for the dismantling of our huge holding company systems is so great that the task of elimination cannot be accomplished in a year or two without possibly too great sacrifice of apparent values. Furthermore, it seems administratively advisable that every opportunity be offered the owners of holding company securities to work out their own processes of dismantling. That opportunity should, of course, be vigilantly guarded to protect the average investor from the exploitation threatening him almost as a matter of course under our usual methods or modes of corporate reorganization.

After recommending in a concrete way devices to effect corrections in the existing system and elimination when finally necessary, the committee makes this statement:

> The Commission should study existing systems so that they may be simplified by the elimination of unnecessary corporate complexities and of properties which do not fit into an economically and geographically integrated whole. Simplification and reorganization of holding company structures, making possible within a reasonable period the practical elimination of the holding company, should be conducted under the Commission's supervision over a period of time to prevent undue losses to security holders from investment dislocations.

I am in total agreement with those who advocate the ultimate elimination of certain holding companies; but, in my opinion, the provisions of the bill now before us, as reported from the committee, accomplish that in a far more sane, judicious, and practical way than the 5-year limitation as provided in the Senate bill. When I say this, I challenge, I know, the better judgment of the President of the United States; but the President, in his message of March 13, 1935, in referring to the so-called "death sentence", made the following statement:

> The disappearance at the end of 5 years of those utility holding companies which cannot justify themselves as necessary for the functioning of the operating utility companies of the country is an objective which congressional leaders I have consulted deem essential to a realistic and farsighted treatment of the evils of public-utility holding companies. (Italic is mine.)

What congressional leaders he had reference to I do not know; but when it comes to a matter of this extreme importance, I must reserve the right to match my own judgment with that of other Members of Congress, and this I have done, resulting in a disagreement with some members of the committee in the minority on this question as to the propriety of the original section 11. I am willing to go down the line, and I am hopeful that the President will eventually see the wisdom of doing so in adopting a standard as to what is detrimental to the public interest, so far as utility holding companies are concerned; to require all utility holding companies to register, giving complete exposure to the Federal Commission of every activity thereof; and if they cannot meet the test laid down by Congress, that then they shall dissolve. That gives these companies their day in court and removes from the picture failure, with which I believe many of them would meet in an effort to reorganize and come down to such a system as reason and common sense will countenance should a definite date ahead be set by law as to when they must bring about such a reorganization. Many thousands of people in this country have bought stock in these holding companies of doubtful, maybe of no value, but they are hopeful that something is coming back to them with the return of better days. I look for disappointment to many of them in this thought, and yet I am unwilling, because I see absolutely no necessity therefor, to take upon myself as a Member of Congress the burden of defending to my constituents who are fortunately, or unfortunately, investors in the holding companies of this country, the present low value of their holdings, and the failure of such values to enhance. Some have said that if the Senate bill is adopted it is an easy matter to break down the holdings of those companies which would be eliminated and to show in concrete form what the owners of those investments would receive in lieu thereof; but we asked for such a break-down during the weeks at the hearings on this bill, and not a single individual connected with the Federal Government, either in the capacity of drafters of this bill or in the commissions which will ultimately administer, have been willing to assume that task. In other words, the practical effect of section 11 of the Senate bill is not known, except that it will entail great losses and confusion; and a clear and intelligent summary as to what it will accomplish in the case of any company, I care not which one you might choose, has not been presented for our information, although it has been repeatedly requested.

In the case of section 11 of the bill before you, an investor will know that the company in which he is interested cannot continue to function because of certain specified facts and if that company cannot meet the test laid down by Congress, which is a reasonable one, I expect to find my constituents, who are such investors, conceding that the company in which they are interested is one that has deceived them and the fault of their losses is not directly or indirectly attributable to any mandatory requirement of a congressional act, but because of the structure of the company short of fraudulent, which has been brought into the open for their own information and satisfaction.

The law applicable to regulation of public utilities necessarily informs one as to the ability of Congress to approach control of holding companies and decree the elimination thereof by a definite date. I have read the law on this subject, which has been presented in the able briefs of the young gentlemen who drafted this legislation, or at least had a large part in doing so, and also the discussion of the bills before the Senate and the excellent papers of members of our committee heretofore printed in the RECORD and in the committee's report, especially to my distinguished colleagues Mr. PETTENGILL, of Indiana, and Mr. EICHER, of Iowa. It is unnecessary for me to say that the legal phases of this subject have been discussed at great length during the hearings and in the sessions of the committee. I commend all of it to the Members of the House, and satisfying me as it does, that section 11, as contained in the Senate bill, is unconstitutional I cannot vote for it, and hope that the more practical plan as recommended by the committee in the bill now pending before you will be adopted.

In closing this discussion I cannot refrain from commenting briefly upon the situation in my own State of Maryland, as to the regulation and control of public utility companies and holding companies. Our public service commission is one of the outstanding regulatory agencies in all the States, and such is frankly admitted by those who know it. So far as strictly intrastate activities are concerned, the Public Service Commission of Maryland has splendid laws to administer. As far back as 1929, when a holding company applied to the Maryland commission for approval of a large stock issue by an operating company in the State of Maryland which it controlled the Honorable William Cabell Bruce, former distinguished Senator from my State, and then general counsel of the public service commission wrote an opinion, the following extracts from which I believe are of interest:

The applicant is a Maryland corporation and, in addition to its character as a holding corporation and otherwise, is expressly authorized by its charter to perform the corporate functions of a gas corporation; and owns all, or the majority, of the common stock of the Central Gas & Electric Co., a foreign corporation, which, in turn, owns all, or the majority, of the common stock of the Hagerstown Light & Heat Co. of Washington County, a Maryland corporation which operates a gas plant in Washington County, in the State of Maryland.

Under these circumstances the applicant, in my opinion, is a "gas corporation", and, as such, subject to the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission of Maryland, because, by section 346 of article 23 of the Annotated Code of Maryland, the term "gas corporation" is made to include not only any corporation owning, operating, or managing but also any corporation "controlling" any plant, or property, for manufacturing, distributing, and selling for distribution, and selling or distributing, illuminating gas (natural or artificial or manufactured, and wheresoever and howsoever derived and obtained), for light, heat, fuel, or power, or for any public use whatsoever; and because, by section 350 of the same article, it is provided that the jurisdiction, supervision, powers, and duties of the public service commission shall extend to the manufacture, sale, or distribution of gas, natural and artificial, within the State of Maryland, and to the persons, or corporation, owning, leasing, operating, or "controlling" the same, and to gas plants, and to persons or corporations, owning, operating, leasing, or "controlling" the same.

In my judgment, a gas corporation which owns all, or the majority, of the capital stock of another gas corporation, which owns a gas plant, "controls" the plant, in the sense of sections 346 and 350 of article 23 of the Annotated Code of Maryland. It is true that the Central Public Service Corporation does not control the plant of the Hagerstown Light & Heat Co. immediately, but only mediately through its ownership of all, or the majority, of the common stock of the Central Gas & Electric Co.; but this, in my judgment, also constitutes "control", within the intent of sections 346 and 350 of article 23 of the Annotated Code of Maryland. The ownership by corporation A of all, or the majority, of the capital stock of corporation B, and the ownership by corporation B of all, or the majority, of the capital stock of corporation C, a gas corporation, which owns a plant in the State of Maryland, gives, as I see it, to both corporation A and corporation B, a share in the control of the plant of corporation C; that brings each of them under the jurisdiction of the commission. They are links in a chain of common control, though only corporation C actually operates the plant; otherwise corporation A, by merely interposing an intermediate corporation between itself and corporation C, could wholly escape the authority of the commission, no matter to what extent it might be the real moving impulse back of the plant of corporation C, and no matter to what degree its corporate acts might tend to inflate the rates, or impair the service, charged or rendered, to the general public by corporation C.

Further quote:

Before, then, the commission gives its sanction in any form, or to any extent, to the proposed sale of stock, in this case to the Central Public Service Co., it would be well for it, as a matter of proper procedure, to require that company to make a formal application to it for leave to buy the stock, and its application should comply with all provisions of rule XI of the commission relating to application for authority to acquire shares of stock, which are germane to the circumstances surrounding the application of the applicant in this case. Or, if the commission does not do this, it should, at least, require the applicant in this case to lay some authentic evidence, in the form of a written contract or otherwise, before it, showing that the Central Public Service Co. has actually agreed to buy the stock. Authority from the commission to the Central Public Service Corporation to sell to the Central Public Service Co. necessarily involves authority from the commission to the Central Public Service Co. to buy the stock from the Central Public Service Corporation (P. S. C., vol. XIII, 287); but as, unlike in the case just cited, no order has yet been passed by the commission in this case, there is no reason why the agreement of the Central Public Service Co. to buy the stock in question should not, as a matter of regular procedure, be evidence by its own application as well as that of the Central Public Service Corporation, or in some other adequately authentic form as by the production of a copy of the written contract of sale and purchase relating to the stock or otherwise.

The aforegoing merely emphasizes what has become so clearly a fact during these hearings, that government now seeks to cure in a drastic way that which not the offenders are solely responsible for, but which government, State and National, derelict in its constitutional duties permitted to be done. It has been a costly experience, costly to the unfortunate investors, but I believe they are willing to have those losses registered as sufficient consideration to the enactment of legislation dealing with the future. I do not believe they should be treated in an arbitrary and dictatorial manner, and in a way that will cause harassment, worry, and in many cases disgust, ending finally in a declaration by the Supreme Court that their rights were destroyed, or controlled in a way that was never contemplated by the Constitution of this country and which cannot be tolerated. They will find in the end, if the more drastic legislation proposed is enacted, that there is an effort, as I have said at the outset, to drift toward a government of men rather than a government of law. I conceive it my duty, as a Member of Congress from a great State, representing nearly one-third of its population, presenting as fair a cross-section of the country as can be found, to raise my voice in opposition to such legislation and to encourage and support the defeat thereof. The bill before us, as reported by the committee, is not perfect, but it is a far-reaching step in the right direction and will accomplish in the end all of those necessary and essential things said to be, and found to be, advisable to eliminate the abuses of the past and assure, so far as this industry is concerned, and the many ramifications of its activities, a certain security for the future. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I realize when one rises in opposition to this measure he subjects himself to the criticism that he is the mouthpiece of the utility interests of the country. I also realize that sometimes it becomes one's duty to rise in opposition to legislation that is so unnecessary, so vindictive, so destructive as this legislation is. In my opinion no legislation as destructive as this has ever before received the serious consideration of this Congress.

I am another one of those who can discuss this measure from an absolutely unbiased point of view. I have no connection whatever with the utility interests in any way, shape, manner, or form. In fact, I am anxious to get back home now to assist in trying a case against one of the biggest utility companies in my district. I am not thinking of the officials of utility companies when I rise in opposition to this measure, but I am thinking about the thousands of investors who are going to be sacrificed if this measure becomes a law.

I wish I had time to read just a few of the letters that I have received, and I know that you have received similar ones. These letters are not propaganda letters. I have dozens of letters that I can bring here from intelligent people in my district who know what is going to happen to them. Some of them are outstanding Democrats who express surprise that their great President of the United States, whom they voted for, has seen fit to espouse the cause of this legislation. I think we can sometimes judge proposed legislation by looking for a moment at the sponsors of the legislation and also at those who are opposed to it. I have no knowledge of any investors or any consumers of electricity who have been here in advocacy of this bill. The newspapers are fairly good judges of the attitude of the people of the country, and I have it on good information that a survey of that field shows that 83 percent of the newspapers of the country that have editorially commented in regard to the legislation are in opposition to it.

What is the justification for the legislation? If there is any justification at all for this legislation it would have to be the assumption at least that it would result in reduced cost to the consumers of electricity. I make the statement here now that in my opinion, instead of resulting in a reduction in the cost of electricity to the consumer the result will be an increased cost after a brief time to the consumers of electricity.

It has been claimed by the advocates of the so-called "public-utilities bill" that the passage of the bill should speedily accomplish a reduction in the rates paid by consumers for electric service. An understanding of the controlling factors in determining the rates for service and an appreciation of existing conditions would clearly show that the above claim is entirely fallacious and that if the passage of this legislation has any effect on the future rates for service, such effect cannot fail to be to increase rates rather than reduce same.

The fallacious claim that rates can be reduced is based substantially upon two false premises—first, that the existing capitalization of companies is a basic and controlling factor in the fixing of rates and that therefore any simplification of capital structure leading to a reduction of outstanding capital should automatically serve to reduce rates; second, that holding companies have through the intermediary of construction and management contracts, been able to obtain excessive income from the operating companies and through such charges to the operating companies impose unreasonable expenses and correspondingly higher rates. The fallacy underlying these claims results from the fact that the State or other regulatory bodies in approving the rates for service do not take into consideration, as a factor in rate making, the question of capitalization but such rates are invariably fixed so as to yield to the companies only a fair return upon the value of the property devoted to the public service. Such value is arrived at by appraisal of the property, in which appraisal the capitalization of the company is totally ignored. If there is an excessive capitalization in the form of bonds or stocks and if the physical property employed by the company has not sufficient real value to enable the company to earn interest on its bonds and dividends on its stocks, the full disadvantage of such fact is borne by the bondholders or stockholders of the company and not by its consumers. This has been the procedure universally followed for many years under the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States and the passage of the proposed bill will have absolutely no effect upon same.

Also, with respect to the expenses of the operating company, the controlling State commission or other regulatory authority is obligated to pass upon the reasonableness of all expenses incurred by the company and deny to the company any charges which are unreasonable or improper. No construction or management contract is binding upon any such commission if it is unreasonable and against the interests of the company's consumers. The passage of the proposed bill would not in any way alter or increase the powers of the regulatory authorities.

In determining or approving rates for electric service, regulatory authorities must give consideration to both the income and expenses of the company affected. The income is, of course, determined by the volume of business and the rates to be charged. The income of the company must be sufficient to cover all operating expenses, including allowance for depreciation or amortization of plant and property and in addition such sum as will represent a fair return upon the fair value of the property devoted to the public service.

In the item of operating expenses the major items are: First, fuel; second, labor; third, general expenses.

In respect to fuel and labor, large increases in expenses have been enforced upon the companies during the past 2 years through the operations of N. R. A. There are indications that such increases are likely to continue in effect and that they will be largely beyond the control of the managements of the companies.

The major items of general expenses are taxes and the cost of compliance with regulatory administrations. Taxes now imposed upon electric-power companies approximate 15 percent of the gross revenue, and in no other industry has the Federal Government imposed an excise tax which is not passed on to the ultimate consumer. It must be clear, therefore, that there are no provisions in the proposed bill which could be expected to result in reducing any of the operating expenses of the companies; but in respect to the last remaining item of general expense—that is, the cost of compliance with regulatory authorities—the bill can only result in a very large increase in expense without any corresponding advantage to the public.

It is proposed in the bill that every element of regulatory supervision now imposed upon the companies through State or other regulatory authorities shall continue, and that in addition both the holding companies and the operating companies shall be subject to a very drastic supervision by both the Federal Securities Commission and the Federal Power Commission. Every operating company in the country as well as the holding companies, excepting the relatively few operating companies which can qualify as strictly intrastate under the terms of the bill, will have to maintain contact with these two Federal commissions in Washington, which will not only involve large expense but impose constant restrictions and delays in operating procedure to the disadvantage of promptness and efficiency in the rendering of service and meeting of the demands of the public. While it is not possible to accurately estimate the amount of the added expense involved, there is no question but that it will be substantial.

A fair statement, therefore, as to the effect of the proposed bill upon the rates for electric service must admit that there is no provision in the entire bill that can reasonably tend to a reduction in rates, whereas the increased Federal regulatory provisions of the bill represent increased obligations and work, all of which will mean additional expense to the companies with no offsetting items.

Mr. Chairman, who will be injured by the passage of this bill? I think it is admitted by everybody that the investors will be injured very seriously, and second to them the general economic situation in the country will become chaotic, and the rank and file of the people of America will suffer. There is no question but that the passage of this measure will retard recovery. What utility company today, headed by officials with common horse sense, with their business to be taken away from them within 5 years, will expend money of their stockholders in betterments or extension? At a time when this Government should be encouraging investment in private industry, to the end that the unemployed may be employed, we find legislation that has the contrary effect.

Only a brief time ago I had occasion to go down into the region of the Tennessee Valley Authority and there I learned this to be true. It was almost unbelievable, but it has been verified since that time by testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs of this House.

The Aluminum Co. of America has made quite an extensive development in the little Tennessee River Valley. They have already expended $40,000,000 in building dams, to say nothing of the amount expended in building their plants along this river. There are other projects there under immediate anticipation that would involve the expenditure of $60,000,000 more. What happened? There is one project there that requires 10,000 acres in the basin. This company has acquired the title to practically all of the 10,000 acres, but, lo and behold, just last August it was discovered that some agent of the Tennessee Valley Authority had slipped over there into the very heart of the 10,000 acres and found a little tract of ground, 30 feet by 50, 1,500 square feet, and had bought it at a rate of $5,000 an acre, and took title in the name of the United States Government, and then retired from the scene, and no one since has been able to contact anyone in respect to it or even discuss the situation.

Now, what is the result of that? The result of it is that it absolutely stops any further development of that territory, because they cannot build a dam and flood that 10,000 acres if there is as much as 1 square foot that they do not own. I say that things have come to a sorry pass in this Nation when the taxpayers of the Nation are taxed and the money used in such a manner as that, at a time when industry should be receiving some encouragement, instead of continuing to pass legislation so much of it having the effect of unsettling business conditions and continuing unemployment in this Nation. This agency of our Government is guilty of practices in this case that, if resorted to by a utility company, would be severely and justly condemned. The greatest service this administration could render the country would be to change its attitude toward private industry. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time, 13 minutes, to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL].

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, you all remember the famous lines of Mark Antony, "I come not to praise Caesar, but to bury him." Paraphrasing those lines, I want to say, "I come not to praise any holding company, nor do I come to bury them."

I am not for the decapitation bill under any circumstances. I am for strict regulation of holding companies. It seems to me that the important thing before the country today is the question of economic recovery. We have been engaged in a battle against the depression, which has already continued much longer than the World War. We have had a grim struggle and the ultimate outcome is still in the balance. Business has been on its knees for many years and, if conditions obtain much longer as they have in the last few years, there is a question as to what the result will be. One thing that business has been waiting for these many years is some indication that a holiday would be declared on legislative voyages in weird ships into uncharted seas. We have been experimenting so long that business does not know what to expect next. For months business enterprises have been waiting in the trenches with fixed bayonets, ready to go over the top at the zero hour to fight the depression, but the zero hour has not arrived, and there may not be a zero hour if we are asked to pass legislation such as this indefinitely—legislation which proceeds upon the premise that all business is crooked and that those engaged in business are public enemies and should be put away.

Now comes the order from the Chief Executive of our country to the effect that all utility holding companies must be decapitated. The guillotine has been rolled out and the blade sharpened, and there are those who are waiting to see the heads fall. I am of the opinion, if this comes to pass, they will find, as did the mobs at the time of the French Revolution, that in ridding the country of some bad ones they also killed off many good ones, whom they could ill afford to lose.

I am sure this legislation did not emanate from the brain of SAM RAYBURN. I doubt if it emanated from the mind of Senator WHEELER. I am just as morally certain it did come from that group of smart young men who have been advising the Chief Executive in his efforts to get together a group of political panaceas. I am speaking now to you gentlemen. Ours is the group which was elected to pass laws, and those who elected us did not mean, did not presuppose, that those laws should be handed to us written by young, inexperienced "brain trusters", whose political philosophies and theories, I feel sure, are not those of the great majority of the Members of this House or the American people. Are we still a body of statesmen and legislators, or are we just obeisant automatons? It is about time that we are reasserting our rights in this body and reestablishing ourselves as thinking men. In other words, the people who elected us, elected us with the idea that we would come here from the far corners of the country with the viewpoint of the people of our districts, and that we would attempt to find out the legislation which would be in the best interests of all of the people of the country. We were expected to legislate in favor not of a particular few but of the country generally.

If this bill, as has been said from time to time, is a forerunner of Government ownership of utilities, then why in the name of common sense are we not fair enough to approach this problem in the American way, in a decent, respectable way, and give to the people who have been led to believe that their investments in these companies were safe and sound the fair value of their investments? Why do we not appraise the properties fairly and justly, and appropriate enough money to buy up those companies at a fair valuation—not at forced sale, not knocked down under the hammer to the highest bidder? Why do we not buy those utilities and give the people who have their life savings invested a run for their money? If we are going to have Government ownership, let us have Government ownership; but let us not have the stigma of having taken the property away from the people of this country unjustly and unfairly and, I think, illegally.

I am not speaking for Wall Street now. I am speaking for Main Street. I am speaking for the main street of every little town and hamlet in the United States. I am talking for the ordinary garden variety of American citizen who has been frugal and who has saved a few dollars for his or her old age, who has been led to believe, by the action of this Government in allowing this type of corporate organization to thrive, that their investments were safe.

A man or a woman who raises his voice on the floor of the House in the interest of the hundreds of thousands, yes, the millions of the people of this country who stand to lose, in many instances, everything they have ever saved by reason of ruthless legislation such as is contemplated in this bill, will in all probability be the target for demagogic attack by the sponsors of the bill.

Members talk about holding companies. Why, the most powerful holding company I know of in this country is the company of young "brain trusters" who are holding the future of America in the palms of their hands.

I read a story the other day of some little children in Russia who had become diseased. The Russians, in order to get rid of the situation easily, took the children out ostensibly to administer a cure, and, so the story goes, when they got them beyond the walls of the city, beyond where the people of the city would know what was happening, they took machine guns and mowed them down. That was the easiest way of getting rid of what they considered a bad situation. It seems to me this bill contemplates just about such ruthless action on the part of the Government.

The House bill is better than the Senate bill, but it seems to me the House bill simply substitutes a slow death for a quick one. In either event it is equally fatal whether one dies slowly or quickly. It reminds me of the story of a man who had passed away and someone in talking with a relative of his afterward asked what caused his death. "Well," said the relative, "I do not know exactly, but I don't think it was anything serious." [Laughter.] And that is just the situation here; when these holding companies are dead they will be just as dead whether they were killed under the Senate bill or under the House bill. The pending bill allows the Securities and Exchange Commission, at their option, to take off the heads of holding companies; and I submit to you that a holding company, no matter how good or how bad, will have just about as much chance with the Securities Commission as a nice little wooly lamb would have if dropped at evening into a corral of hungry coyotes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EKWALL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It has been very prominently mentioned in the newspapers the last week or two that Mr. Ben Cohen was to be appointed a member of the Securities Commission. I think Mr. Cohen had more to do with writing the death sentence into the Senate bill than any other man.

What chance will the utilities have with such men on the Commission?

Mr. EKWALL. Just as much chance as the little woolly lamb would have of which I spoke a moment ago.

I hold no brief for holding companies as such; some of them are good and some of them are bad; but I submit that with honest utility-commission officials and efficient corporation commissioners, who will fulfill their oaths of office, who will conduct themselves properly in the various States, you can correct the abuses charged against holding companies or, for that matter, any abuses on the part of any corporation. In this body my colleague the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT], who represents the First District of Oregon, was corporation commissioner of the State of Oregon for several years; and I want to tell you that there were no abuses in the State of Oregon while Mr. MOTT was corporation commissioner such as have been charged against holding companies during this debate, because he was a real corporation commissioner and conducted his work in such manner that there were no similar abuses. A like condition can obtain in every other section of the country if the officials will do their part. There are plenty of laws now on the statute books; there are plenty of regulations. The trouble with business today is that it has been regulated to death; and I want to tell you right here and now, I want to sound this warning, that if we do not quit unreasonable regulation pretty soon and give business a chance to rise from its knees to its feet, we shall have no business in this country, and the Government will have to take it all over, as apparently some of the people of this country are hoping at the present time. What we need is work to start, and industries to take heart again, to put back men and women on the pay rolls, to create a buying power in this country, so that the products of industry can find a ready market once again.

I do not believe we have any moral right or any constitutional right to decapitate these companies, to take their heads off, as has been suggested in the Senate bill. I am against both bills as they are now written. I am for strong regulation; yes. I will vote for a very strict regulatory bill, but I am not for a bill that will arbitrarily take away from millions of people their property rights. I think it is unconstitutional, I think it is unfair, and I think it is un-American.

I understand there is a movement on foot to pass this bill here in its present form and then in conference to substitute the original section 11 of the Senate bill. I make the prediction that if such a thing takes place you will see one of the greatest fights on the floor of the House that you ever have seen.

It is my opinion that those who want to have this bill passed in its drastic form would do better to accept the bill in the manner in which it finally passes the House; and I do not believe it is going to be passed with any "death sentence" clause in it such as was placed in the Senate bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is apparently not welcomed by the utility holding companies, but if I read the signs correctly, they are not greatly disturbed. They are going to be irritated about the matter, but not very much. It perhaps will be a little more effective than firing a charge of birdshot into the dragon, instead of confining him so that he can no longer prey upon the innocent. But, in my opinion, it will not render the dragon entirely helpless.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] this morning made a very skillful, clever, and, I think, a rather effective speech. I could not quite concede that the gentleman from Alabama was entirely fair, however, in some of the criticisms which he made of the able Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I have a great deal of sympathy with the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and a good deal of sympathy with the position in which he was placed by means beyond his control. The gentleman from Alabama had a great deal to say about the abandonment by the chairman and others of this waif of a bill, and he almost intimated that the Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee [Mr. RAYBURN] had been guilty of some serious offense in leaving this helpless and unprotected infant in this condition.

I thought that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] displayed admirable restraint and used excellent judgment in apparently taking the position, as I understood him to take, that he was going to salvage as much as possible that was good in this bill and, if possible, put something more vitally effective into the bill. [Applause.]

I thought the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] showed some restraint in not disclaiming the paternity of his offspring. In his very able speech yesterday he gave you the legal statutory definition of a holding company—and I think correctly—but I am going to give you a practical definition.

The holding company in the beginning was a device originated by a small group of men, who were not pioneers in the electrical industry or any other industry, who were not the men who went out there and tamed the flood, harnessed the waters, and brought about the electric-power industry; they were not the men who took their chance in creating wealth and furnishing employment to make our country alive with industry. Those men were not the ones who wanted to reach out for control. The holding company was a device whereby a little group of men sought to avail themselves of the fruits of the toil of other men and to reap the profits of others. A holding company has never had any excuse for existence in our economic life and has no excuse for existence now.

I am not a member of this committee. Frankly, I have not analyzed the bill nor the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill so that I could discuss it in detail if I had the time to do so. I have read various parts of these hearings, and particularly I have read the very able report of a member of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER]. I was greatly impressed. I hope every Member of the House will read the supplemental views of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER] as a guide to his action upon this legislation. I think that the position taken by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. EICHER], and the position taken by our leader, the President of the United States, can be rested upon these figures alone, and at the risk of repeating what I think the chairman gave you yesterday, but with a little different conclusion, I point your attention to the fact that in 1929, before the crash, the total market value as shown upon the exchanges of this country of all the outstanding securities of the holding companies was about $29,000,000,000.

The fair approximate value, then, of all the properties of the operating utility companies was about $12,000,000,000. Fasten upon that. These holding companies, with their $29,000,000,000 of market value of securities outstanding, still did not own the operating companies, although they controlled them by various devices with which many of you are familiar. They controlled them by virtue of an ownership of less than 25 percent of the stock of operating utility companies, or about $3,000,000,000. By a strange coincidence, if it be a coincidence, in March 1933, before the Roosevelt administration came in, incidentally, the same $29,000,000,000 of securities, which these innocent holding companies had sold to the American public before this legislation was proposed, had shrunk, and the shrinkage had been going on in 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, to about $3,000,000,000, or to just about the amount of their holdings of the stock of the operating companies. In other words, they had gotten down to somewhere near actual value.

When I get these letters and telegrams, with which some Members of the House, I am sorry to say, seem to be buffaloed, which I know is nothing but a skillful, insidious propaganda from people who say that in the twilight of their lives they are about to suffer the loss of their savings, my answer is—and I want this to go back home to my constituents—if they own the stock of the operating companies they are not going to lose one nickel by this legislation, but, on the contrary, they will be protected against loss and will be benefited, because the management of the operating companies when returned to a more immediate local control, removed from the burden of the racket of the overhead charges which the holding companies are fastening upon them in the form of engineering charges, service charges, and all those things, will be able to lessen the operating expenses.

But if, unfortunately, they be the holders of the securities of holding companies, then my answer to them is that whatever loss they are going to suffer, they have already suffered, because the stock went down to the bottom before the Roosevelt administration came in and before this legislation was proposed.

Now, the issue is bigger than anything I have mentioned. It is the issue of whether we are going to have representative government or whether we are going to have a government controlled here by 25 holding companies. I am not going to be buffaloed by this kind of propaganda, because in each and every instance if my constituents will tell me what securities they hold, I think I can point out to them who got their money and how and when it was done, and it was not done by the Roosevelt administration. [Applause.]

Inevitably the purchasers of the securities of Cities Service, Electric Bond & Share, the Associated Gas outfit, and the other pirates in the field who had bought at the top, lost an amount proportionate to the shrinkage from twenty-nine billions to three billions. Fasten upon that! It is an old ruse of the thief who has gotten the loot and hidden it to divert the hue and cry and "stop thief" to another direction than his own; and so now the utility holding companies—organized as they are, munitioned with moneys which they have stolen from the public as they are—have the means to persuade the holders of their securities that the losses which they have already lost and which they lost prior to the time when the Roosevelt administration came in were caused by the Roosevelt administration and by the legislation.

If any other argument were needed to convince any Member of this House of the lack of justice, the lack of defense, of the holding companies, it is the fact that they are again deceiving—or attempting to deceive—the investors whom they have already robbed. And I want to say, for the benefit of my constituents who have been sending me letters, and many of whom probably own stock in operating companies, that they will not lose one nickel by this legislation, because this legislation will lessen the expense of the management of the companies, the securities of which they hold, and will protect them as against dishonest operation.

The issue today in this legislation is bigger than anything I have yet mentioned. The question here is whether we, the Congress, are going to legislate to protect our people, to govern them so that economic freedom and economic liberty will prevail in the land, or whether this control of government—of legislation—this poisoning of the very sources and fountains of information by the great utility holding companies is going to continue, so that we may not have a government of the people by their representatives, nor economic freedom and economic liberty in the life of the Nation.

This House bill contains in my opinion not only an unconstitutional but an unreasonable and unworkable delegation of power. The power is placed in the Commission to determine whether a utility holding company be allowed to continue as such—we do not declare a policy or set up a standard by which the Commission is to determine that question. If the Congress in such a manner shirks its responsibilities and "passes the buck" to the Commission, what can we expect the Commission to do? I am in favor of going down the line with the President of the United States, my leader, and in going down the line in this case with the chairman of the committee and, in general, the Senate bill. I am in favor of going down the line with the men who have fought the Power Trust for years, like, for example, JOHN RANKIN, of Mississippi, who has so valiantly fought the Power Trust, and others whom I could mention in this House. I am not in favor of surrendering in this cowardly manner to the 25 great utility holding companies in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the committee substitute for the Senate bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the first section of the committee substitute.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 2796, had come to no resolution thereon.

STATUE OF HANNIBAL HAMLIN

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I send to the desk a privileged resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 27

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed with illustrations, and bound, in such form and style as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Hannibal Hamlin, presented by the State of Maine, 1,000 copies, of which 200 shall be for the use of the Senate and 500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 300 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Maine.

SEC. 2. The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall provide suitable illustrations to be bound with these proceedings.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE PUBLIC DOMAIN GRAZING LAW

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago today President Roosevelt signed an act which I am honored to have bear my name. It is entitled "An act to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration; to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development; to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range; and for other purposes"—Forty-eighth Statutes, page 1269.

When the act was presented to the President for signature tremendous pressure was exerted by self-styled conservationists to secure a veto of it on the ground that the proposed law was unconstitutional and implying it was a betrayal of the public interest. After careful deliberation and the receipt of an opinion from the Attorney General that the bill was entirely constitutional, the President approved the law and issued the following:

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT ON APPROVAL OF THE TAYLOR GRAZING ACT

The passage of this act marks the culmination of years of effort to obtain from Congress express authority for Federal regulation of grazing on the public domain in the interests of national conservation and of the livestock industry.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the protection, orderly use, and regulation of the public ranges, and to create grazing districts with an aggregate area of not more than 80,000,000 acres. It confers broad powers on the Secretary of the Interior to do all things necessary for the preservation of these ranges, including, among other powers, the right to specify from time to time the number of livestock which may graze within such districts and the seasons when they shall be permitted to do so. The authority to exercise these powers is carefully safeguarded against impairment by State or local action. Creation of a grazing district by the Secretary of the Interior and promulgation of rules and regulations respecting it will supersede State regulation of grazing on that part of the public domain included within such district.

Water development, soil-erosion work, and the general improvement of such lands are provided for in the act.

Local residents, settlers, and owners of land and water who have been using the public range in the past are given a preference by the terms of the act to the use of lands within such districts when placed under Federal regulation so long as they comply with the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior. The act permits private persons owning lands within a district to make exchanges for Federally owned lands outside a grazing district if and when the Secretary of the Interior finds it to be in the best public interests.

The Federal Government by enacting this law has taken a great forward step in the interests of conservation, which will prove of benefit not only to those engaged in the livestock industry but also to the Nation as a whole.

On this first anniversary of that law it would seem appropriate for me to make a report to Congress and to the country on the progress that has been made during the past year toward carrying out the objects and purposes of that law. I am genuinely gratified to say that the law is apparently being looked upon throughout the country as one of the greatest attempts at real, constructive, and far-reaching conservation ever enacted by Congress. It is publicly stated that there is no human possibility of estimating the value of stabilizing its use and preserving our remaining 165,000,000 acres of public domain and saving the forage on it for the future prosperity of the livestock industry and growth of the West.

For over 25 years those of us who have been actively engaged in public-land legislation and who live in that part of the West where the public domain still remains in large areas have realized that the existing land laws were totally inadequate to either properly dispose of or to bring about any orderly use of, or to preserve, the remaining public lands. In other words, all of the land, and much more than all of the lands, on which a person could make a living and maintain a home, in tracts of 640 acres or less, have been disposed of long ago. The remaining acreage of public domain situated in the 10 Western States is now as follows:

	Acres
Arizona	13,203,600
California	16,576,463
Colorado	7,545,773
Idaho	10,510,421
Montana	6,176,931
Nevada	51,270,277
New Mexico	13,078,285
Oregon	13,012,158
Utah	25,011,021
Wyoming	14,327,024

These lands are mostly rough, broken, or rocky and very poorly watered grazing lands and cannot be converted into anything else except by artificial irrigation, which is, generally speaking, impossible. Congress has never been willing to recognize this condition, and for years has allowed and encouraged ill-advised people to homestead in these arid areas with a resulting tragic loss of their time, labor, money, and appalling hardships and heartbreaking disappointments, and thousands of them being compelled to abandon their claims, and the lands have gone to tax sale or returned to the public domain.

No method of either leasing these lands or of regulating the grazing thereon has ever been provided for prior to the passage of this so-called "Taylor Grazing Act" of June 28, 1934. As a result of this situation a very large part of the public lands had become badly overgrazed, eroded, and entirely barren; and a large class of stockmen had come legitimately into the business of maintaining many millions of sheep almost exclusively upon public lands. These roving itinerant sheepmen came into competition with the many thousands of resident ranchmen throughout the West who owned their lands and homes near the public domain. Because of the mobility of their flocks and their economic advantage of not having heavy real-estate taxes, upkeep, and other burdens to assume, the nonresident migratory sheepmen were able to monopolize a large share of the public domain to the ruinous injury of the small local farmers and stockmen. The resulting conflict of interests between the resident land-owning stockmen and these migratory owners has been very bitter, often resulting in bloodshed and strife of various kinds. In the absence of Federal legislation many of the States were compelled to assume jurisdiction over the public domain to keep the peace and prevent bloodshed and ruthless destruction of property. My own State of Colorado passed a law whereby these public ranges could be adjudicated by the State courts for exclusive or mixed use by cattle or sheep.

In Nevada individual priorities to ranges were recognized by the courts. In New Mexico exclusive right to public ranges adjoining developed stock water was provided for. In Idaho sheep were denied the right to graze within 3 miles of a residence or town, and in nearly all the other States the same or similar measures were resorted to.

That was the situation when this grazing law was signed a year ago today. Practices built up over 50 years of free and unrestricted use were suddenly to be systematized and in many cases curtailed. A complicated system of customs and State legislation were as suddenly made void, because their validity on public lands was admittedly only good in the absence of Federal legislation.

This law provided for the disposition of the remaining 165,000,000 acres of public lands in five ways:

First. By sale.

Second. By lease.

Third. By exchange.

Fourth. By homestead, where of the proper type.

Fifth. By inclusion in grazing districts of not to exceed 80,000,000 acres.

The act did not go into elaborate details, but gave a wide discretion to the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out its provisions.

Since the first four methods of disposition would obviously affect only the isolated and smaller tracts, the natural procedure was to first find out what lands should be included in grazing districts and how and where they should be established.

This new change in policy was the cause of great interest and tenseness on the part of the western ranchmen, and particularly of the stockmen using the public domain. The task of the Secretary was a most difficult and indescribably complicated one, in view of the vast existing industry affecting probably several million people owning farms and many millions of cattle and sheep totally or partially dependent on public-domain vegetation, and the mass of uses, customs, local regulations, and State laws to be superseded.

The Forest Service under the Agricultural Department has been actively engaged for some 30 years in working out suitable rules and regulations for grazing upon about 130,000,000 acres of public domain of the United States within the forest reserves. In the main, they have finally worked out an efficient system, and they are preserving the range and rendering a great service to the stockmen and to the country, notwithstanding there has been a large amount of criticism and many hardships complained of, especially by the little fellows; and there always has been and still is wide-spread complaint that the local ranchmen and small stockmen have very little or no voice in determining who shall use the range or where or to what extent. But bureaucratic regulation is the law of the forest reserves. That is not the law under this Grazing Act.

Now, when it is considered that upon the shoulders of the Secretary of the Interior a year ago today was suddenly placed the herculean task of systematizing and regulating the use of 80,000,000 acres of the remaining public domain that had for all times been open common, subject to free and unrestricted exploitation and destruction with no law but force and with customs long followed and with enormous amounts of capital invested upon the basis of a continuation of such conditions, anyone can readily visualize the gigantic responsibility and the most complex and difficult problems and complicated matters that he was confronted with and compelled to handle and work out.

No fair-minded person can expect the Secretary of the Interior to accomplish anything like as much in 1 year as the Forest Service has done in 30 years.

I do not want to be understood as criticizing the Agricultural Department or the Forest Service, and I have no brief whatever for the Interior Department, and I do not want to get into any controversy between them, but I cannot resist feeling that it comes with ill grace for the friends of the Forest Service to be keeping up this unwarranted fusillade attack on the Interior Department. It is not serving any good purpose.

Being the ranking member on the Appropriations Committee, which apportions practically all the money Uncle Sam has, and being the chairman of the Interior Department subcommittee that handles the funds of that Department, I naturally look at Government affairs largely from a financial standpoint. While I have not had time to check up the figures, my off-hand guess is that there are a thousand employees in the Forest Service for every dozen that there are in the Grazing Division of the Interior Department, outside of its regular departmental employees, and that the expenditures of the Forest Service for the fiscal year 1935 will be fully 20 times as much, both per acre and in aggregate amount, as the Interior Department will expend on the grazing administration of the public domain, and 40 percent of what it does expend will go to the local advisers in each grazing district for their actual necessary expenses in holding meetings to determine for themselves the many complicated questions that will arise in each grazing district as to who is entitled to permits to put on stock, and how many he may rightfully range and where his range will be. In other words, for the fair, just, orderly, and peaceable use and local self-control of the grazing on the public domain without force or favoritism, there is no such service as that in the Forest Service and no appropriations that go to them are expended in that way.

I confidently predict that this Grazing Act will become a universally popular law throughout the West because it is right, and fair, and necessary, and also because of the fact that for the first time in our history the people directly affected by it; that is, the cattlemen, sheepmen, and local ranchmen will be governed by definite provisions of a Federal law that they can readily have access to and always enabled to learn if they do not know what it is and know that it is not going to be changed overnight, and more important than all that, because they have a controlling voice in its administration.

THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

On last Monday I and the other Members of Congress received a lengthy mimeographed circular issued by the Society of American Foresters, which, I understand, is officered largely by employees of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, renewing the absolutely unwarranted attack made on this law prior to its final approval, alleging that no evidence has yet been forthcoming that the Interior Department is competent either to solve the problems of the public domain or to conserve its resources. The newspapers also published a synopsis of it.

The Interior Department needs no defense from me or anybody else, and neither the Secretary nor anyone else is responsible for what I may say. But in my active practice of the law during 20 years before coming to Congress, and all during my service in Congress, I have been in constant and close contact with the officials of the Interior Department and its various bureaus both as a member of the Public Lands Committee for 12 years and as a member of the Appropriations Committee for the past 14 years. The record of that Department during the 86 years of its existence furnishes overwhelming evidence of the outrageous injustice of such charges. I have also read the history of that Department, and its record of handling the public lands and all its vast other activities is one of the most glorious chapters of our history. All departments have had a few black sheep, but none of them has ever had a more difficult task or measured up higher than that Department.

I have watched the activities of the Secretary and his assistants during the past year with intense interest, because this matter is of such vital importance to the West, and also because of the fact that I have lived among those stockmen practically all my life, and among them I am held somewhat responsible for this law, and I am most exceedingly gratified at the progress that has been made in the administration of it. The Secretary has gone about it in a very fair, frank, thorough, and businesslike way. He and his assistants have during the entire year been constantly consulting the wishes of the local stockmen and ranchmen in every Western State, and trying to cooperate with them in working out a system which would practically put the control of the range into the hands of the local people themselves and stabilize the range stock business and treat both the cattlemen, sheepmen, and local ranchmen fairly, and properly respect the rights of the local settlers and the little fellow with his milk cows, work horses, and few head of stock.

My father was a cattleman all his life, and during my whole life I have been primarily interested in the welfare of the tens of thousands of small local stockmen and ranchmen generally throughout the West. And those people were the ones that I was most concerned about in the enactment of this Grazing Act, and they are the ones that I am now primarily concerned about in helping as much as I can toward bring about the honest and practical administration of this law.

A set of rules has been drawn up which has received practically the unanimous endorsement of the users of the public range themselves. Not only that but also a new, and it seems to me an epoch-making, experiment in integrating Federal and local control has been inaugurated. No Federal bureau has to my knowledge ever so completely decentralized itself, and I look forward to the time in the very near future when the local people will control their own grazing on the public domain. Just a few words about the Interior Department. It was first established as the Home Department in 1849, and through the 86 years that have since elapsed that Department has been the custodian and conservator of the national domain, with the exception of 28 percent of the area now in national forests and which have been under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture since 1905, together with game refuges, which are also within the jurisdiction of that Department insofar as such refuges are not within national parks or monuments.

At one time the public-domain area embraced a total of nearly a billion and a half acres, exclusive of Alaska and other territorial possessions. A billion acres have been disposed of, 69 percent to individuals, mainly for settlement and home building; 9 percent to corporations in aid of pioneer transportation systems; and 22 percent to the public-land States in aid of education, transportation, and reclamation.

The general leasing law, which reserves our basic minerals and provides for the proper development, was sponsored by the Department of the Interior, as was the reclamation of swamp lands; the classification of public lands; the creation and administration of forest reserves; the reclamation of arid lands; the regulation of grazing on the public domain; the generation and distribution of electrical power; the preservation of American antiquities; the reservation of coal deposits, water-power sites, and mineral deposits; the leasing of coal lands in Alaska; the creation and administration of national parks; the leasing of public lands for potash, coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, fur farming, and grazing; and the unit operation of oil and gas lands. The charge has been made repeatedly that the Department of the Interior has dissipated the public domain through grants. The fact is that the public-land policy of the Government has always been exclusively the responsibility of Congress, and that it has resulted in the development of the great western empire, without which our eastern markets would be very much curtailed. In disposing of the public domain various laws reserving the natural resources have been enacted beginning with the year 1785, when the first law relating to the disposal of lands in the western territory reserved one-third of the gold, silver, lead, and copper to the United States. The leasing of mineral lands was inaugurated in 1807 and the reservation of timber commenced in 1817. The remaining Federal landed estate is somewhat less than a half billion acres, and includes a great variety of natural resources of inestimable value in the economic life of the Nation. With the enactment of the Taylor grazing law practically all of these natural resources are now under some form of Federal administration.

During the year which has elapsed since the enactment of the Taylor Grazing Act of June 28, 1934, the Department of the Interior has been very actively engaged in preliminary steps toward carrying out the terms and provisions of the law. A review of its activities will indicate whether that Department is fulfilling the trust imposed upon it by the Congress.

The initial step by the Interior Department in the administration of the Taylor Law was a series of public meetings held in the 10 principal public-land States for the purpose of explaining the law to the stockmen and seeking cooperation from local interests to the end that all the natural resources involved might be properly conserved with a minimum of disturbance to the local industrial activities. That Department, through its long experience, has learned that the sturdy pioneer people capable of developing the resources of this Nation and surviving the vicissitudes of a sparsely peopled country should be encouraged and not subjected to harsh or poorly informed bureaucratic action. The Department has proceeded with commendable caution in the administration of the Taylor law and with almost unbelievable results. It has taken its problems to the people most vitally concerned and with the cooperation and aid of a class of American citizens of unsurpassed intelligence and loyalty to the national welfare has attained in the short space of 1 year an objective that could have been attained by a bureaucratic organization only through several decades of painful and disturbing activities.

Following the general meetings, hearings were held in each State at points convenient for the attendance of State officials, settlers, residents, and livestock owners, in accordance with the requirement in section 1 of the law. At these hearings, State committees were organized to consult with representatives of the Interior Department in subdividing the public domain areas into grazing districts suitable for administration. As a result of their deliberations, the establishment of 50 grazing districts was recommended, embracing in the aggregate about 143,000,000 acres of vacant, unreserved, unappropriated public land.

The bill as I originally introduced it in the House applied to all the unreserved remaining public domain, estimated at about 170,000,000 acres, and the bill passed the House in that form. The Senate reduced the amount to 80,000,000 acres that might be put into grazing districts, and it became a law in that form. Within this first year there are now formal applications to create grazing districts amounting to 63,000,000 acres more than the law authorizes. A bill has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate amending the law to cover the remaining public domain, as was originally intended, and should be promptly authorized.

When the people of the West themselves request the creation of these districts for the protection and orderly use of the range, they ought to be given that permission. I hope that bill will be speedily approved by the Senate, because if it is not, the lands that remain outside of grazing districts will very soon be completely ruined by overgrazing and erosion.

The action of the State committees involved an acreage far in excess of a limitation of 80,000,000 acres fixed by the law on the establishment of grazing districts. Furthermore, it was urged upon the Department that unless the entire area involved in the recommendation of the State committees was placed under administration, all of the evils of the unregulated public grazing which have heretofore existed on the entire public-land region would be concentrated on the lands left unregulated. Then, too, throughout the Nation protests were submitted indicating that wildlife, which constitutes an important natural resource in the public-domain region, should be given consideration. State and railway land agents also desired special consideration. The complexity of the problems in the administration of the law are not limited to the livestock industry, but are of vital concern to a region comprising nearly one-third of the United States.

Pending completion of detailed plans involving equitable consideration of all interests, an Executive order was issued under date of November 26, 1934, withdrawing from all forms of entry all of the vacant, unreserved, unappropriated public lands in the 10 States which will be mainly affected by the law.

In conformity with the 80,000,000-acre limitation, 32 grazing districts have been established in the areas most urgently in need of range regulation. In eight of these districts special plans for wildlife later will be adopted as a result of conferences between game interests and western stockmen. Action on 18 other districts will be delayed pending decision by the Congress on legislation to lift the 80,000,000-acre limitation.

In 22 of the established districts there have been elected advisory boards, composed of selected representatives from among the stockmen, to furnish the Interior Department with information concerning local range users as well as methods and practices of range operations adaptable to the conditions prevailing in their respective grazing districts. Applications for range privileges are in process of adjudication in these districts and limitations on grazing are now or will be effective in these 22 districts during the next 60 to 90 days.

The issuance of permits within grazing districts under the law must be limited to the extent necessary for the "proper use of the land." Fulfillment of this requirement necessitates an expert knowledge not only of the carrying capacity and proper use of the public domain but also the extent to which the land can and should be utilized to supplement the feed resources of the privately owned land to the end that a well-balanced land-use program may be devised for each grazing district. Therefore it has been determined that, pending technical studies to obtain the necessary information, only temporary licenses will be issued and such licenses will be subject to revocation at any time after completion of range studies have indicated a proper procedure for the conservation of range resources. A total of 500 of these temporary licenses has been issued for three districts, involving an aggregate use of the public lands in the district within a reasonably safe limit for proper range practice.

The personnel engaged in the administration of the law is almost exclusively composed of technicians of long training in public domain studies in the Geological Survey and other bureaus of the Interior Department. By reason of their knowledge of the public domain they are far more competent to inaugurate immediate range administration than the employees available in any other Federal organization. Their records include determinations of range-carrying capacities over an extensive part of the public domain as well as information concerning improvements needed for the efficient utilization of range resources.

The basic system for land classification studies utilized in securing this information has been developed in the Interior Department for every type of land, even including timbered areas. It is of interest to note that the system for such work now used in the Forest Service was originated in the Interior Department, though both agencies have contributed to the undoubted improvements that have occurred during the past 30 years.

From the standpoint of conservation of natural resources the Federal Government retains and will exercise under the Taylor Act complete jurisdiction. From the standpoint of the affairs of the local people, the advisory boards of local stockmen determine the local individuals who are entitled to range privileges under the preferences defined in the act, and the Government contemplates that exercise of supervisory jurisdiction only will be necessary.

There has already been a very active local and State cooperation in this new method of administration by the Department of the Interior, and I understand that in one State alone, Oregon, six State laws were passed at the last session of the legislature to help effectuate cooperation of State, county, and Federal lands and controlling bodies. Montana, California, Nevada, and North Dakota have also passed similar laws at the last sessions of their legislatures.

As a special feature in the public-domain administration, the Interior Department has been allocated 50 C. C. C. camps which will be distributed over the public domain area in an approximate ratio of one camp to each grazing district. The work projects for these camps will include a wide field of range development activities. Watering places will be developed, poison plants eradicated, predatory animals and rodents exterminated, trails developed, drift fences constructed, and any other activities undertaken that may be necessary for a rational grazing system and land-improvement program. Included in this program will be an expansion of range research activities which have heretofore been undertaken by various agencies. I understand it will be the purpose of the Interior Department to utilize the results of range research work to furnish the stockmen actual demonstrations of the benefits that they may obtain from proper range practice. It is anticipated that by following such procedure necessary range conservation will be obtained with enthusiastic support.

I had the pleasure of attending several of the public meetings in Colorado, where the administrative policies of this act were discussed, and especially the first one in my home city of Glenwood Springs, at which the first grazing district in the United States was formed. I sincerely believe that in those meetings, with their spirit of enthusiastic cooperation, there is the promise of a wise use of our national resources far exceeding anything ever witnessed before. I have within the past few days heard with pride that that first district has complied with all the requirements of the law and the regulations and that the complete organization of grazing district no. 1, including some 5,000,000 acres of land adjacent to my home, began active operations on the 19th day of this month.

In conclusion I am glad to pay a tribute to Secretary Ickes. Confronted with many almost insurmountable obstacles, he and his assistants have made a splendid record in the inauguration of this great conservation measure, and in the years to come I know the West will be genuinely grateful to him for his honest, persistent, and courageous services in their behalf.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

A joint resolution of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. J. Res. 72.
